

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

Lane's Uniform Edition.

RICHELIEU.

A TALE OF FRANCE.

BY

G. P. R. JAMES, ESQ.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

SANDBORNTON, N. H.

1840.

PUBLISHED BY CHARLES

.

.

•

.

Dearly beloved Reader,

ALTHOUGH I call the following pages mine, and upon the strength of them write myself author, yet I must in truth confess, that I have very little to do with them, and still less to do with the story they record; and therefore I am fain to treat the world with something of my own exclusive composition, in the shape of a preface. The facts of the case are as follow: I one day possessed myself of a bundle of manuscript notes—no matter, when or how, so that they were honestly come by, for that is all that you, or I, or Sir Richard Birnie, have to do with the matter. Now I say they were honestly come by, and the onus probandi must rest upon the other party. So no more of that.

My dear Mr. Colburn, where was 1? I quite forget—Oh, now I have it! Having one day possessed myself of a bundle of manuscript notes,—honestly "e by,—I proceeded to read them, and although and was small and crooked, with all the K's like Laocnons, and every g like a pair of es, yet them are something in the table there in through before 1.1

every word of lage which you reing this bet

PREFACE.

ceedings. Suffice it that in the end the q yourite was shot as he entered the pala Lawre, and she herself was instantly arc exiled to Blois. Among others of her con shared in the fall of the queen, was Richu for some time he remained in exile at Avi

The queen's party, however, was still France; and in her misfortunes, the fac discontented, who had formerly opposed sures merely because she held the reins o ment, now supported her against the hand those reins had been transferred. A civil y ed inevitable, and in order to avert such the king's advisers found themselves oblig gotiate with the princess whom they had a sed; but Mary rejected all intercession, a not till the return of Richelieu that any con could be effected. That minister, howe the deep diplomatic skill for which he spicuous, instantly availed himself of the w in the character of his mistress, and thr medium of her confessor won her to his pu reconciliation was now speedily effected Mary and her son, and Richelieu having the friend of the one and the confidant of I w timealf placed more surely than his wife, originated a thousand factions and civil wars, which kept the country in a continual state of tumult during the king's minority. These factions, and the circumstances which they engendered, necessarily gave rise to various rapid changes in the queen's ministry, and amid these, for the first time, appeared on the political stage Richelieu, then Bishop of Lucon. His prospects yet doubtful, and his ambition still in its infancy, Richelieu made mildness and courtesy his first steps towards pre-eminence. He contented bimself with an inferior station in the council : his urbanity and his talents proved equally agreeable and useful; and no one beheld in the calm and polished Bishop of Lucon, and promise of the aspiring and remorseless Cardinal de Richelien.

PREFACE.

A circumstance, however, occurred almost in the outset of his career, which had nearly thrown him for ever from the destined scene of his aggrandizement. This was the fall of the Marechal d'Ancre, and the arrest of the queen-mother.

On the marriage of Louis XIII., the jealous eye of Mary de Medicis soon perceived her son's first uffection towards his young wife, and, fearful of an influence which might spring up to counteract her own, she found means to destroy, without remorse, the domestic happiness of her child, in order to secure her own dominion over him. But while she fomented every disagreement between Louis and his wife, and watched the least symptom of reviving affection with the suspicious anxiety of uncertain power, she blindly suffered near his person of favourite who combined with the genius to form great designs, the most consummate art to conceal them. Monsieur de Lovnes, it appears, from the first moment of his intimacy with the king, projected tis master's deliverance from the tyranny of Mary de Medicis; but lest he should be suspected of designs, he hid them beneath the mask of levity at thoughtlessness. It would be little appropriate to enter more largely into the details of the deranged condition—a condition little to have been expected from the vigour of his government, and the severe exactitude of his disposition.

PREFACE.

But so it was. The partisans of the various factions which had long been imbodied as armies, were fain, after his measures had dispersed them as considerable bodies, to take refuge in the less cultivated parts of the country-the mountains, the forests, or the wastes ; and as they had before lived by anarchy, they now contrived to subsist by plunder. The nobles being called from their strongholds to expensive cities, and compelled by Richelieu's jealousy to show themselves continually at his luxurious court, could no longer maintain the host of retainers which had formerly revelled at their expense, and these also were obliged to join themselves to the various bands of freebooters that infested the country. Occasionally a merciless execution of some of these banditti awed the rest for a time, but upon examining history, even to the end of Richelieu's life, we find that while he governe the nobles with a rod of iron, saw every attempt conspiracy with a prophet's foresight, and represe it with a giant's strength, he overlooked or forg those crimes which did not affect his poli situation.

Such was the siste of France at the open

.

have been, in some degree narrates.

Be that as it may, I feperuses it to the end will be of its truth; and in the hope I leave them to commence to them all a safe and happy is ion.

the lived planstrong-Richenually at intain the revelled at priged to join ebooters that merciless exd the rest for ven to the end he governed ry attempt at and repressed ed or forgave his political he opening of g attempted to to follow, I notes at the nation of my The mantis present from the first he narrative screen f indperfectlynee of the points, I he mugt

A. 1. M. A. S.

-

.

CHAPTER I.

Which shows what a French forest was in Lord 1642, and by whom it was in

RICHELIE

The vast Sylva Lida, which in Charlemagne stretched far along the Seine, and formed a woody screen ro city of Paris, has now dwindled to a acres in the neighbourhood of St. Laye. Not so in the time of Louis th It was then one of the most magnific France, and extending as far as the to sides that it was in earlier days, there many a bitter and a heavy war, not only against her enemies, but of France agains drea. Religious and political differences by disunion between man and man, had banis 1 al confidence and social intercourse, and those feuds and hatreds which destroy peace and retard public improvement. A mie ral distrust and civil wars, industry had recei encouragement; and where stand at present a full hamlet and busy village, where the vi yields its abundance, and the peasant gath, peace the bounty of nature, were then the g copses of the forest, the haunt of the wild boar deer. The savage tenants of the wood, howe did not enjoy its shelter undisturbed ; for in those days of suspicion bunting was a safer sport that conversation, and the boughs of the oak a mor secure covering than the gilded ceilings of the saloon.

12

To our pampered countrymen, long nurtured in that peculiar species of luxury called comfort, the roads of France even now must seem but rude and barbarous constructions, when compared with the smooth, joltless causeways over which they are borne in their own land ; but in the time of Louis the Thirteenth, when all works of the kind were carried on by the seigneur through whose estates they passed, few but the principal roads between one great town and another were even passable for a carringe. Those, however, which traversing the wood of Mantes, served as means of access to the royal residence of St. Germain, were of a superior kind. and would have been absolutely good, had the nature of the soil afforded a steady foundation ; but this was not always to be found in the forest, and the engineer had shown no small ingenuity in taking advantage of all the most solid parts of the land, and in avoiding those places where the marshy of andy quality of the ground offered no secure by these circum

ed mutu-	branched off from it to join to branched off from it to Mantes, as instead off from it to join the his straight line, with a long rous with domestic nid gene-	greight line with one inte hig Brenadiers on a long mornin
man	forest, that seeds side, wert w forest, that seed turnings among to their broad branches across in ter it from the obve
AL VARA	their broad beemed to mong t
ers in green	time from the alies across is for r and	ding, climbing at usive range as 1
ever	times, climbing the obtrusive rays of i display a wide view over the limit, in the eye caught the 1050	display a wide view over the leafy titles of a wide view over the leafy cities breaking the towers than	the eye caught the side of a hill, it the eye caught the towers and si cities breaking the far gray line of forest, it would almost seem to the the wild groves and
ore	the would a would a inte o
10	the wild groves and savannas, being around. In the time of the savannas, being around.
in	around. man's laborious has, being be	the wild groves and savannas, being trace of man's laborious hand amid t around. In the heart of the bid	from woods (white wood at a e	In the heart of the wood, at that point from each other, stood the but of two the store other, stood the but of the abrewoir where
R	Would stopp and sold the long horse time to when his hunsi a gay lord
8 1 1	that plause to arink. There was over ÷	horse tarp when his hunting way lord , horse the to drink. There was over , would pause to ask his way through that philip the known to at would pause to drink. There, too, many that Fhilip the woodman and his brought at amost all

14 RICHE year, " falling gently into only a scarce perceptible landscape, which told that was quitting that quarter the equal blessing of his sn on distant climes. That sl nal for Philip the woodmi home, and he issued forth paths, near his dwelling, sin hunting-song of Le bon roi " King Degobert in days Put on his hose wrong sid Says St. Eloi, the king's o I would not offend, most But may your slave he sou If your majesty is not oddly For you've got the wrong s Says the king, +I do not ca One's breeches are scarcely A beggar's a king when he? So turn them about which And he quick, you s-Now St. Habert, in all prot person who correctly knows ho the very unmeaning and inapp bon roi Dagobert should have bee clusively to the noble exercise of it has no reference whatever; but and even to the present day when . This rong of Le bon rol Dagabert in long, and contains a great deat of with inserted here. The above is a nonewh the first verse, which stands thus in the F. " Le hon roy Dagohert Mettoit ses culoiles a renvers. Le hon St. Eloi Lui dit, Oh mon roy ! Que voire Majeste Est hien, mal ca lotte. Eh hich, dit ce boa roy, le consens qu'on les mete

Philip proceeded, but be can opening the cottage door, he spoke without opening the cottage way, demanded hee, "has the your regen-ing. "Charles," demanded hee, "has the your regen-teman returned who passed by this more nigg to

"No, father," answered the boy, coming Forward ; "nobody has passed since you went-1 am sure no one has, for 1 sat on the old tree all the morning, hunt ?" carving you a sun-dial out of the willow branch you brought home yesterday;" and he drew forth one of those ingenious little machines, by means of which the French shepherds tell the time. " said his father, laying his boy." But still, "Thou art a good hand on his head, " as the woodman sp by some anxiety, fr and listened. est," said Philip, son was present, buy seemed occupied ked up the road e faces in the foriloquizing, for his aking more to himte strange faces in .I deed is to be done .

self than to the boy.

the forest, and I fear me as

But here they come, thank God !-No ! what is As he spoke there appeared, just where the read this ?"

turned into the wood, a sort of procession, which would have puzzled any one of later days more than it did the woodman. It consisted of four men on horseback, and four on foot, escorting a vehicle, the most elegant and tasteful that the age produced. The people of that day had doubtless very enlarged notions, and certainly the carriage 1 speak of would have contained any three of modern construction (always excepting that in which his most gracious majesty the King of England appears on state occasions, and also that of the Lord-mayor of London

Indeed, the one in question was more like a state

carriage than any other; broad at the top, low in the axle, all covered over with painting and glidin with long wooden shafts for the horses, and gr taffeta curtains to the windows ; and in this gui came on, swaying and swaggering about over the ruts in the road, not unlike the bloated Dutch pug of some over-indulgent dame, waddling slowly on, with its legs far apart, and its belly almost trailing on the ground.

When the carriage arrived at the abreuceir, by the side of which Philip had placed himself, the footmen took the brildes from the horses' mouths to give them drink, and a small white hand from within drew back the taffeta curtain, displaying to the woodman one of the loveliest faces he had ever beheld. The lady looked round for a moment at the forest scene, in the midst of whose wild ruggedness they stood, and then raised her eyes towards the sky, letting them roam over the clear deepening expanse of blue, as if to satisfy herself how much daylight still remained for their journey.

"How far is it to St. Germain, good friend ?" said she, addressing the woodman, as she finished her contemplations; and her voice sounded to Philip like the warble of a bird, notwithstanding a slight peculiarity of intonation, which more refined ears would instantly have decided as the accent of Roussillon, or some adjacent province: the lengthening of the i, and the swelling roundness of the Spanish u, sounding very differently from the sharp precision peculiar to the Parisian pronunciation.

" "I wish, Pauline, that you would get over that had habit of softening all your syllables," said an old lady who sat beside her in the carriage. "Your French is scarcely comprehensible."

"Dear mamma !" replied the young lady, playfully, "am not I descended lineally from Clemence Isnore, the patroness of song and chivalry ? And I should be sorry to speak aught but my own langue d'oc-the tongue of the first knights and first poets of France.-But hark ! what is that some and the horsemen who accompanied the carriage; " murder is doing in the forest. Help, for the love of God !"

"Now help, for the love of God!" stick woodman, snatching forth his are, and early YOL. 1.

But as he spoke, the trampling of a horse's feet was heard, and in a moment after, a stout black charger came down the road like lightning; the dust springing up under his feet, and the foam dropping from his bit.

Half falling from the saddle, half supported by the reins, appeared the form of a gallaat young cavalier ; his naked sword still clasped in his hand, but now falling powerless and dragging by the side of the horse; his head uncovered and thrown back, as if consciousness had almost left him, and the blood flowing from a deep wound in his forehead, and dripping among the thick carls of his dark brown har.

had never been taught to regulate its beatings by the frigid rules of society, or the sharp scoarge of disappointment, now took the wounded man's nead upon her knee, and gazed for an instant upon his countenance, the deadly paleness of which appeared still more ghastly from the red streams that trickled over it from the wound in his forehead. She then attempted to stanch the blood, but the trembling of her hands defeated her purpose, and rendered her assistance of but little avail.

The elder lady had bither to been giving her directions to the footmen, who remained with the carriage, while those on horse beack rode on towards the fray. "Stand to your arms, Michel!" cried she. "You take heed to the coach. You three, draw up across the road, each with his arquebuse ready to fire. Let none but the true men pass.-Fy! Paulines, I thought you had a firmer beart." She confineed, approaching the young lady. "Give me the handkerchief.-That is a bad cut in his head, truly; but here is a worse stab in his side." And she proceeded to unlose the gold loops of his hunting-coat, that she might reach the wound. But that action seemed to recall, in a degree, the senses of the wounded cavalier.

"Never! never!" he exclaimed, clasping his hand upon his side, and thrusting her fingers away from him, with no very ceremonious courtesy,--"never, while I have life."

"I wish to do you no harm, young sir, but good," replied the old lady :---I seek but to stop the bleeding of your side, which is draining your heart dry."

The wounded man looked faintly round, his senses still bewildered, either by weakness from loss of blood, or from the stunning effects of the blow on his forehead. He seemed, however, to have exactly and comprehended some of the words which the out lady addressed to him, and answered them by slight inclination of the head, but still keet his be slight inclination of the head, as if he had some for wishing it not to be opened.

The time which had thus elapsed more than sufficed to bring the horsemen, who had accompanied the carriage (and who, as before stated, had ridden on before,) to the spot where the servants of the cavalier appeared contending with a party not only greater in number, but superior in arms.

The reinforcement which thus arrived gave a degree of equality to the two parties, through the freebooters might still have retained the advantage, had not one of their companions commanded them, in rather a peremptory manner, to quit the conflict. This personage, we must remark, was very different, in point of costome, from the forest gentry with whom he herded for the time. His dress was a rich livery suit of Isabel and silver; and indeed he might have been confounded with the other party, had not his active co-operation with the banditii (or whatever they might be) placed the matter beyond a doubt.

Their obedience, also, to his commands showed, that if he were not the instigator of the violence we have described, at least his influence over his lawless companions was singularly powerful; for at a word from him they drew off from a combat in which they were before engaged with all the hungry fory of wolves eager for their proy; and retreated in good order up the road, till its windings concealed them from the view of the servants to whom they had been concosed.

These last did not attempt to follow, but turning their horses, together with those who had brough them such timely aid, galloped op to the spot wher their master lay. When they arrived, he had age fallen into a state of apparent insensibility, and th all flocked round him with looks of enger any which seemed to speak more heartfelt interest. generally existed between the murmuring y and his floaded lord.

One sprightly boy, who appeared to be apprang like lightning from the saddle, and by his side, gazed intently on his face, as i

some trace of animation. "They have killed him !" he cried at length, "I fear me they have killed him !"

"No, he is not dead," answered the old lady; "but I wish, Sir Page, that you would prevail on your master to open his coat, that we may stanch that deep wound in his side."

"No, no! that must not be," cried the boy, quickly; "but I will tie my scarf round the wound." So saving, he unloosed the rich scarf of blue and gold, that passing over his right shoulder crossed his bosom till it nearly reached the bilt of his sword, where, forming a large knot, it covered the bucklings of his belt. This he bound tightly over the spot in his master's side from whence the blood flowed; and then asked thoughfully, without raising his eyes, "But how shall we carry him to St. Germain ?"

"In our carriage," said the young lady ; " we are on our way thither, even now."

The sound of her voice made the page start, for since his arrival on the spot, he had scarcely noticed any one but his master, whose dangerous situation seemed to occupy all his thoughts; but now there was something in that sweet voice, with its soft Languedocian accent, which awakened other ideas, and he turned his full sunny face towards the lady who spoke.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed she, as that glance showed her a countenance not at all unfamiliar to her memory: "Is not this Henry de La Mothe, son of our old farmer Louis ?"

"No other indeed, Mademoiselle Pauline," replied the boy; "though, truly, I neither hoped nor expected to see you at such a moment as this."

"Then who"-demanded the young lady, clasping her hands with a look of impatient auxiety -- " in the name of Heaven, tell me who is this?"

For an instant, and but for an instant, a tone arch meaning played over the boy's compress but it was like a flash of lightning on a cars

22

lost as quickly as it appeared, leaving a deep gloom behind it, as his eye fell upon the inanimate form "That, madam," said he, while something glistened brightly, but sudly, in his eye, Pauline spoke not, but there was a deadly pale-" that is Claude Count de Blenau." ness come upon her face, which very plainly showed how secondary a the e elder lady, her compared with per-" is it possible

Well, something brow darkening must be done for

head

ł

Cloude de Blensu, in such a situation !" we shall be glad to serve the count-Henry, help Michel and Regaard to place your master in the car-

"Trouble !" exclaimed Pauline ; " trouble ! Henry de La Mothe, do you think that my mother or mymuch trouble." Belf would find any thing a trouble, that could serve " Of course naze -- Michel, give me your arquebuse ; I will hold it till you have done.-Heary, support your master's But Pauline took that post upon herself, notwithstanding a look from the marchionass, if not intended to forbid, at least to disapprove. The young lady however, was too much agaitated with all that har occurred to remark her mother's looks, and follow occurren to remain act moments proves, and received ing the first impulse of her feelings, while the se vants carried him slowly to the carriage, she s ported the head of the wounded cavalier t arm, though the blood continued to flow fro wound in his forehead, and dripped amid th

sooil as possible, if you should not consider it too in the carriage and convey him to St. Germain as

The best thing that can be done for him, Madame la Marquise," answered he, "is to put him it had betrayed more pride than compassion.

The page did non _ om parcoalarly well pleased with the tone in which the lady spoke, and in truth,

en the sig-	echoed through the fa
owards his the forest
me the old	occupied upon another naturally inclined to en and the second s	ones and indifferent
(Carried)	PL'in PL'in enga
and the second	Philip advanced slowi brow knit in such a man light song had no man and some of the local division of the local	the perhaps per part in hu;	locks of his hair labour ha and the second second	of a lonoted by h: Bray.
1000	tannu cacept the side coat
ed that	tore ones, out and or a
0 10	his a derend his above th
ed ex-	was brought far over his even

RICHELLEU.

CHAPTER II.

In which new characters are brought upon the stage, and some datk hints given respecting them.

The sun had long gone down, and the large clear autumn moon had risen high in his stead, throwing a paler but a gentler light upon the wood of Laye, and the rich wild forest scenery bordering the road from St. Germain to Mantes. The light, unable to pierce the deeper recesses of the wood, fell principally upon those old and majestic trees, the aristocracy of the forest, which, raising their heads high above their brethren of more recent growth, seemed to look upon the beam in which they shone as the right of elder birth, and due alone to their aspiring height. The deep shadows of their branches fell in here somple shapes across the inequalities of the the basing but glimpses every now and then to there at that hour of whatever being might wander

On one of those spots where the next spans fell, stood the cottage of Philip the woodman: and the humble hut with its straw thatch, the open space of ground before it, with a felled oak which had lain there undisturbed till a coat of soft green moss had grown thick over its rugged bark, the little stream dammed up to afford a sufficient supply of water for the horses, and the large square block of stone to sid the travelier in mounting, all were displayed in the clear moonlight as plainly as if the full day had shone upon them.

Yet, however fair might be the night, there were very few who would have chosen the beams of the mono to light them across the wood of Mantes. In south, in those days, sunshine was the best safeguard to cravellers. For France swarmed with those who athered in their harvest at sight, and who (to use their own phrase) had turned their swords into reaping-hooks.

Two grand objects fully occupied the mind of that famous minister the Cardinal de Richelieu (who then governed the kingdom with almost despotic sway:) the prosecution of those mighty schemes of foreign policy, which at the time shook many a throne, and in after-years changed more than one dynasty : and the establishment of his own power at home, which, threatened by factions and attacked by continual conspiracies, was supported alone by the terror of his name, and the favour of a weak and irresolute monarch. These more immediate calls upon his attention gave him but little time to regulate the long-neglected police of the country; and indeed it was whispered that Richelieu not only neglected, but knowingly tolerated many of the excesses of the times : the perpetrators of which were often called upon to do some of those good services which statesmen occasionally require of their less circumspect servants. It was said too that scarce a forest in France but sheltered a band of these free rovers, who held themselves in readiness to merit pardon for their other offences. by offending in the state's behalf whenever it should be demanded, and in the mean time took very sufficient care to do those things on their own account for which they might be pardoned hereafter.

We may suppose then it mrely happened that travellers chose that hour for passing through the wood of Mantes, and that those who did so were seldom of the hest description. But on the night I speak of two horsemen wound slowly along the road towards the cottage of the woodman, with a sort of sountering, idle pace, as if thoughtless of danger, and entirely occupied in their own excernsation.

They were totally unattended also, although their dress bespoke a high station in society, and by richness might have tempted a robber to have rther into their circumstances. But were well rmed with pistol, sword, and dagger, and appeared s stout cavaliers as ever mounted horse, having withal that air of easy confidence, which is genecally the result of long familiarity with orgent and

Having come near the abretmoir, one of the two perilous circumstances. gave his horse to drink without dismounting, while the other alighted, and taking out the bit, let his beast satisfy its thirst at liberty. As he did so his eve naturally glanced over the ground at the foot of the tree. Something caught his attention ; and stooping down to examine more closely, "Here is blood, Chavigni !" he exclaimed ; "surely they have never been stupid enough to do it here, within sight

" I hope they have not done it at all, Lafemas," replied the other. "I only told them to tie him, and search him thoroughly; but not to give him a of this cottage."

" Methinks thou hast grown mighty ceremonious scratch, if they could avoid it." of late, and somewhat merciful, Master Chavigni," replied his companion; "1 remember the time when you were not so scrupplous. Would it not have been the wiser way to have quieted this young plotter at once, when your men had him in their

"Thou wert born in the Fauxbourg St. Antoine,

I would ewear, and served apprenticeship to a would event, and served "infrancessory at as bucher," replied Chavigni. fond of blood, Tafemas, as if thou hades sucked it. in thy cradie 1 Tell me, when thou wert an infant Hercules, didst thou not stick sheep instead of

" Not more than yourself, lying villain !" answerstrangling scrpents ?" ed the other, in a quick deep voice, making his hand sound upon the hilt of his sword. "Chavigni, you have taunted me all along the road; you have east in my teeth things that you yourself caused me to do. Boware of yourself! Urge me not too far lest you leave your bones in the forest !"

"Pshaw, man ! pshaw !" cried Chavigni, laughing: "Here's a cool-headed judge! Here's the calm placid Lafemas! Here's the cardinal's gentle hangman, who can condemn his dearest friends to the torture with the same meek look that he puts on to say grace over a beccafico, suddenly metamorphosed into a bully and a bravo in the wood of Mantes. But, hark ye, Sir Judge !" he added, in a prouder tone, tossing back the plumes of his hat, which before hung partly over his face, and fixing his full dark eye upon his companion, who still stood scowling upon him with ill-repressed passion -"Hark ye, Sir Judge ! Use no such language towards me, if you seek not to try that same sharp axe you have so often ordered for others. Suffice it for you to know, in the present instance, that it was not the cardinal's wish that the young man should be injured. We do not desire blood, but when the necessity of the state requires it to be shed. Besides, man," and he gradually fell into his former jeering tone-" besides, in future, under your gentle guidance, and a touch or two of the peine forte et dure, this young nightingale may be taught to sing, and in short be forced to tell us all he knows. Now do you understand ?"

"I do, I do," replied Lafemas. "I thought that there was some deep, damnable while that made you space him; and as to the rest I did not mean to offend you. But when a man condemns his own soul to serve you, you should not taunt him, for it is hard to bear."

"Peace! peace!" cried Chavigni, in a sharp tone; "let me hear no more in this strain. Who raised you to what you are? We use you as you deserve; we pay you for your services; we despise you for your meanness; and as to your soul," he added with a sneer, "if you have any feares on the head—why you shall have absolution. Are you and head—why you shall have absolution. Are you and our dog, who worries the game for and. We have and feed you, and you must take the lashes when suits us to give them. Remember, sir, that you

mas, as he had been depicte hung his head like a cowed l silence pointed out the blood, little pool at the foot of the t

ground in several places round Chavigni gazed at it with e displeasure and uncasiness; for imagined that the necessities the severest infliction on any more ruthless than himself as to one more unhesitating as to th at those times, no bond of amit would have stayed his hand, of what he erroneously considered yet Chavigni was far from natu his after-life showed, even too strongest and decourt efforts.

strongest and deepest affections In his early youth the Cardina remarked in him a strong and peu above all, an extraordinary powe even subduing the ardeut passion at times cardinary for the strong strong the strong strong the strong strong the strong str and stud; but it was his axiom that a state necessity, or (as he said) in othe good of his country; and upon the si maxim, which in fact was the cause of that rests noon his memory, he fand patriot !

⁴ Between Chavigni and the Judge was the Jeffreys of his country, and the name of Le Bourreau du Cardinai of original antipathy; so that the stata often obliged to make use of the le talents of the judge, and even occasi ciate with him, could never refrain 1 of time from breaking forth into thos which often irritated Lafemas almo The hated of the judge, on his part, v even at the times it did not show itas brooded over the hope of exercisin functions upon him who was at prese his master.

But to return, Chavigei gazed inten to which Lafemas pointed. "I belin indeed," said he, after a moment's he must run, that we have lost our way

So saying, he struck several sh arp the hilt of his sword against the do or, ety and unsonorous nature returned indistinct sound, as if it too had share of the peaceful inhabitants of the colla ed not to be disturbed by such nocturned tions. "So ho!" cried Chavigni; "will hear us poor travellers, who have lost our this forest!"

In a moment after, the head of Philip, the man appeared at the little casement by the sire the door, examining the strangers, on whose figfell the full beams of the moon, with quite is cleat light to display the courtly form and garonism. ing their apparel, and to show that they were modangerous guests. "What would ye, messicure are demanded he, through the open window : "It is late for travellers."

"We have lost our way in your wood," replied Chavigni, "and would fain have a little rest, and some direction for our farther progress. We will pay thee well, good man, for thy hospitality."

"There is no need of payment, sir," said the woodman, opening the door. "Come in, I pray, messicurs.—Charles!" he added, calling to his son, "get up and tend these gentlemen's horses. Get up, I say, Sir Sluggard!"

The boy crept eleepily out of the room beyond, and went to give some of the forest hay to the beasts which had borne the strangers thitler, and which gave but little signs of needing either rest or refreshment. In the mean while, his father drew two large yew-tree seats to the fireside, soon blew the white ashes on the hearth into a flame, and haying invited his guests to sit, and lighted the old brazon lamp that hung above the chimney, he bowed low, asking how he could serve them farther; bat as he did so, his eye ran over their persons what a half-satiefied and inquiring glance, which made

Lafemas turn away his head. But Chavigni answered promptly to his offer of service : "Why now, good triend, if thou couldst give us a jug of wine, twould be well and kindly done, for we have ridden far."

"This is no inn sir," replied Philip, "and you will find my wine but thin ; nevertheless, such as it is, most welcomely shall you taste."

From whatever motive at proceeded, Philip's hospitality was but lukewarm towards the strangers; and the manner in which he rinsed out the tankard, drew the wine from a barrique standing in one corner of the room, I alf covered with a wolf-skin, and placed it on a table by the side of Chavigni, bespoke more churlish radeness than good-will. But the statesman heeded little either the quality of his reception or of his wine, provided he could obtain the information he desired ; so, carrying the tankard to his lips, he drank, or seemed to drink, as deep a draught as if its contents had been the produce of the best vineyard in Medoc. "It is excellent," said he, handing it to Latemas, "or my thirst does wonders. Now, good friend, if we had some venison-steaks to broil on your clear ashes, our supper were complete,"

"Such 1 have not to offer, sir," meplied Philip, " or to that you should be welcome too."

"Why, Tshould have thought," said Chavigni, " the hunters who ran down a stag at your door today, should have left you a part, as the woodman's fee."

"Do you know those hunters, sir I" demanded Philip, with some degree of emphasis.

"Not I, in truth," replied Chavigini; though the colour rose in his check, notwithstanding his long training to courtly wile and political intrigue, and he thanked his stars that the lamp gave back and and glimmering light: "Not 1, in truth; but to ever ran him down got a good beast for the like a stug of ten. I suppose they make due like a stug of ten. I suppose they make due

"Those hunters, sir," replied Philip, "give no woodman's fees; and as to the sig, he is as fine a one as ever brushed the forest, dew, but he has escaped them this time."

"How ! did he get off with his throat cut ?" demanded Chavigui, "for there is blood enough at the foot of you old tree to have drained the stoutest stag that ever was brought to haz."

"Oh! but that is not sig's blood!" interrupted Chiles, the woodman's son, who had by this time not only tended the strangers' horses, but examined every point of the quaint furniture with which it was the fashion of the day to adora them. "That is not stag's blood; that is the blood of the young cavalier, who was burt by the robbers, and taken away by--"

At this moment the boy's eye caught the impatient expression of his father's countenance.

"The truth is, massieurs," said Philip, taking up the discourse, "there was a geatleman wounded in the focest this morning. I never saw him before, and he was taken away in a carriage by some ladies, whose faces were equally strange to me."

"You have been somewhat mysterious upon this business. Sir Woodman," said Chavigni, his hrow darkening as he spoke; " why ware you so tardy in giving us this forest news, which imports all strangers traveling through the wood to know ?"

"I hold it as a rule," replied Philip, holdly, "I mind my own business, and never to mention ay thing I see, which in this affair I shall do mopocially, as one of the robbers had farsiture bel and ailver;" and as he spoke he glanced to the scarf of Ghavigni, which was of that maxime of colours then called Isabel, bord rich ailver finge.

"Fool!" muttered Chavigni between "Fool! what need had he to show hims Laboras, who had latherto been silent to the relief of his companion; taking forestion in a mild and easy tone, "Hav of these robbing fraternity in your wood 1" said he; "if so, I suppose we peril ourselves in crossing it alone." And, without waiting for any answer, he proceeded, "Pray, who was the cavalier they attacked 1".

"He was a stranger from St. Germain," answered the woodman; " and as to the robbers, I doubt that they will show themselves again, for fear of being taken."

"They did not rob him then ?" said the judge. Now nothing that Philip had said bore out this inference; but Lafemas possessed in a high degree the talent of cross-examination, and was deeply versed in all the thousand arts of entangling a witness, or leading a prisoner to condemn himself. But there was a stern reserve about the woodman which baffled the judge's cunning: "I only saw the last part of the fray," replied Philip, "and therefore know not what went before."

"Where was he hurt ?" asked Lafemas; "for he lost much blood."

"On the head and in the side," answered the woodman.

"Poor youth !" cried the judge, in a pitiful tone. "And when you opened his cost, was the wound a deep one ?"

"I cannot judge," replied Philip, "being no surgeon."

⁶ It was in vain that Lafemas tried all his wiles on the woodman, and that Chavigni, who soon joined in the conversation, questioned him more boldly. Philip was in no communicative mood, and yielded them but little information respecting the svents of the morning.

At length, weary of this fruitless interrogation, Chavigni started up-" Well, friend !" said he, " had there been danger in crossing the forest, we might have staid with thee till daybreak; but as the sayest there is none, we will hence apon our way So saying he strode towards the door, the say tied with a loop of Built for number of the second woodman bowed, repeating that be required to r horses, the suran not accustomed to have my bounty refused," said Chavigni, proudly; and dropping the purse ed, said Unavigni, prouety ; and this horse. to the ground, he spurred forward his horse. "Now, Lafemas,' said he, when the had proceedment.

YOLAN.

ed so far as to be beyond the reach of Philip's eare, "Why, truly," replied the judge, "I deem that we " what think you of this ?" are mighty near as wise as we were before." te mignty pear as wise as we were before." "Not so, " said Chavigni." these fellows have failed, and De Blenau has pre served the packet : I understand it all. His Emi pence of Richelieu, against my advice, has permi ted Madame de Beaumont und her daughter Paulin to return to the queen, after an absence of ten yea The fact is, that when the cardinal banished th the court and ordered the marchioness to retire Languedoc, his views were not so extended as are now, and he had laid out in his own mit match between one of his nieces and this rich y match between one of his neces and the royal fa Count de Blenau, which out of the royal fa was one of the best alliances in France. I be however, had been promised and even I be affianced by his father, to this Pauline de Beau and accordingly his eminence sent away it and her mother, with the same sang froid man drives a strange dog out of his court.y the same time he kept the youth at conrt, for all communication with Languedoc . but r the eardinal can match his mece to the J Engluca, De Blenau may look for a bride A by and the marg ise and her daughter suffered to return. To my knowledge, they passed through Chartres yesterday morning on their way to St. Germain."

;

"But what have these to do with the present affair," demanded Lafemas.

"Why thus has it happened," continued Chavigni. "The youth has been attacked. He has resisted, and been wounded. Just then, up come these women, travelling through the forest with a troop of servants, who join with the count, and drive our poor friends to covor. This is what I have drawn from the discourse of yon surly woodman."

"You mean, from your own knowledge of the business," replied Lalemas, "for he would confess nothing."

"Confess, man !" exclaimed Chavigni. "Why he did not know that he was before a confessor, and still less before a judge, though thou wouldst fain have put him to the question. I saw your lip quivering with anxiety to order him the torture; rack, and thumb-screw, and oubliette were in your eye, every sullen answer he gave."

"Were it not as well to get him out of the way ?" demanded Lafemas. "He remarked your livery, Chavigni, and may blab."

"Short-sighted mole !" replied his companion, "The very subkiness of humour which has called down on him thy rage, will shield him from my fears-which might be quite as dangerous. He that is so close in one thing, depend upon it, will be close in another. Besides, unless he tells it to the trees, or the jays, or the wild boars, whom should he tell it to? I would bet a thousand crowns against the Prince de Conti's brains, or the Archishop Condjutor's religion, or Madame de Chevreuse's-reputation, or against any thing else that is worth nothing. that this good woodman sees no human should be the the next ten years, and then all that preses there of them will be. 'Good day, woodman's code of them will be, 'Good day, woodman's of the the of the whom they spoke. But notwithstanding the pearance of gayety, Chavigni was not ensy: a seven while he spoke, he rode on with no small pr cipitation, till, turning into a narrow forest path, the light of the moon, which had illumined the great part of the high road, was cut off entirely by the trees, and the deep gloom obliged them to be more cautious in proceeding. At length, however, they came to a hitle savanna, surrounded by high oaks, were Chavigni entirely reined in his horse, and blew a single note on his horn, which was soon answered by a similar soond at some distance.

CHAPTER III.

Which shows what a French forest was at night, and who inhabited it.

Those whom either the love of sylvan sports or that calm meditative charm inherent to wood scenery has tempted to explore the deeper recesses of the forest must be well aware that many particular glades and coverts will often lie secret and undiscovered amid the mazes of the leafy labyrinth, even to the eyes of those long accustomed to investigate its most intricate windings. In those countries where forest hunting is a frequent sport, I have more than once found myself led on into scenes completely new, when I had fancied that long experience had made me fully acquainted with every rood of the woodland round about, and have often met with no small trouble in retracing the spot, although I took all pains to observe the way thither and fix its distinctive marks in my memory.

In the heart of the forest of St. Germain at a considerable distance from any of the roads, or even by paths of the wood, lay a deep dingle or dell, which probably had been a gravel-pit many centuries before, and might have furnished forth sand to strew the hails of Charlemagne, for aught I know to the contrary. However, so many ages had elapsed since it had been employed for such purpose, that many a stout oak had spraug, and flourished, and withered round about it, and had left the ruins of their once princely forms crumbling on its brink. At the time I speak of, a considerable part of the dell itself was filled up with tangled brushwood, which a long hot season had stripped and withered; and over the edge hung a quantity of dry shrubs and stunted trees, forming a thick screen over the wild recess below.

One side, and one side only, was free of access, and this way by means of a small sandy path winding down into the bottom of the dell, between two deep banks, which assumed almost the appearance of cliffs as the road descended. This little footway conducted, it is true, into the most profound part of the hollow, but then immediately lost itself in the thick underwood, through which none but a very practised eye would have discovered the means of entering a deep lair of ground, sheltered by the steep bank and its superincumbent trees on one side, and concealed by a screen of wood on every other.

On the night I have mentioned, this well concealed retreat was tenanted by a group of men, whose wild attire harmonized perfectly with the rudeness of the scene around. The apparel of almost every elass was discernible among them, but each vesture plainly showed, that it had long passed that epoch generally termed "better days;" and indeed, the more costly had been their original nature, the greater was their present state of degradation. So that what had once been the suit of some performalier of the court, and which doubtless had elayer since passed through the hands of the page while perhaps used it to personate this matter, the cated its owner's habit of laying his hand apon

Here, too, every sort of offensive weapon was the met with. The long Toledo blade, with its base her hilt and black scabbard tipped with steel; the double-handed heavy sword, which during the way of the League had often steaded well the troops of Henry the Fourth, when attacked by the superior cavalry of the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, any which had been but little used since; the poniard the stiletto, the heavy petronel, or horse pistol, any the smaller pistol, which had been but lately intro duced, were all to be seen, either as accompaniments to the dress of some of the party, or scatter ed about on the ground, where they had been placed for greater convenience.

The accoutrements of these denizens of the for est were kept in countenance by every other ac cessory circumstance of appearance; and a torcl stuck in the sand in the midst, glared upon features which Salvator might have loved to trace. It was not alone the negligence of personal appearance shown in their long dishevelled hair and untrimmer beards, which rendered them savagely picturesque but many a furious passion had there written deer traces of its unbound sway, and marked them with that wild and undefinable expression, which habits deeply as the rest, but he appeared ne stupid, nor sleepy j and while the tail he cast, from time to time, a caim sm upon the singer, which showed no either for the music or musician.

RICHELIEW.

"You sing about prey," said he, as cluded the last stanza of his ditty—" I prey, and yet you are no great falcon, may judge from to-day."

"And why not, Monsieur Pierremo demanded the Norman, without displa ill-humour in his countenance : " thou to have called you Monsieur Le Noi not Mr. White,—Nay, do not frown, g I speak but of your beard, not of your art thou still grumbling, because we d young count's throat outright ?"

"Nay, not for that," answered the because we have lost the best man a want of his being well seconded."

"You lie, partileu !" cried the Nor his sword, and fixing his thumb upon three inches from the point. "Did youth so much of my iron toothpic have sent it through hum, if his horse ed him away. But I know you, Mast You would have had me stab him i Moriagne slashed his head before. I whose life he saved too !" not swear, when you join the other, to "lorget eve

he well re

lightning over the field, and driving all before it ; and blue and gold were then the best colours that ever 1 saw, for they gave me new heart, and wrenching the standard-pole round—But hark, there is the horn !"

As he spoke, the clear full note of a huntinghorn came swelling from the south-west; and in a moment after, another, much nearer to them, seemed to answer the first. Each, after giving breath to one solitary note, relapsed into silence; and such of the robbers as were awake, having listened till the signal met with a reply, bestirred themselves to rouse their sleeping companions, and to put some face of order upon the disarray which their revels had left behind.

"Now, Sir Norman," cried he that they distinruished by the name of Le Blanc; "we shall see "Forget! forget! let slaves forget The pange and claims they hear; The brave remember every debt To honour, and the fair. For these are bonds that bind us more; Yet leave us freer than before."

"Yes, let those that can do so, forget : but I very well remember, at the battle at Perpignan, I had charged with the advanced guard, when the fire of the enemy's musketeers, and a masked battery which began to enfilade our line, soon threw our left flank into disorder, and a charge of cavalry drove back De Coucy's troop. Mielleraye's standard was in the hands of the enemy, when I and five others rallied to rescue it. A gloomy old Spaniard fired his petronel and disabled my left arm. but still I held the standard-pole with my right. keeping the standard before me ; but my Don drew his long Toledo, and had got the point to my breast, just going to run it through me standard and all, as I've often spitted a duck's liver and a piec of bacon on a skewer; when, turning round head, to see if no help was near. I perceived young Count de Blenau's banderol, coming lightning over the field, and driving all befo and blue and gold were then the best colour ever 1 saw, for they gave me new heart, and w ing the standard-pole round-But hark, there horn !" An I and the second ar full note of book, and	However as a street

my com-utely de-
himself	but calmly, "Well, S tience, and you well, S
tin the	tience, and you shall i told my own way and my voice was for sh nau's horse as he set tage a norse as he stor st
forest, can do ;	tage of the confusion at upon his person, and brake apon his person, and car brake, which lies berger brake, which lies between river-You know where I "No truly," answer angled	Puere truly, anere I
ed tri-	could some dean cred th
Per his	Was wave search part of a he	Frank You shall b Why wen ac, ap	"Yon shall hear in good lone. "A growing some best	freebooter, growing somewh tone. "As you say, St
UPD1	T. Summer a say, or th

from injuring the youth, how is it ye have mangled him like a stag torn by the wolves ?"

The Norman turned with a look of subdued triumph towards him who had previously censured his forbearance. "Speak, speak, Le Blanc!" cried he ; "answer monseigneur.--Well," continued he, as the other drew back, "the truth is, Sir Count, we were divided in opinion with respect to the best method of fulfilling your commands, so we called a council of war-"

"A council of war!" repeated Chavigni, his lip curling into an ineffable sneer. "Well, proceed, proceed! You are a Norman, I presume-and braggani, I perceive.--Proceed, sir, proceed!"

Be it remarked that by this time the influence of Chavign's first appearance had greatly worn away from the mind of the Norman. The commanding dignity of the statesman, though it still, in a degree, overawed, had lost the effect of novelty; and the bold heart of the freebooter began to reproach him for truckling to a being who was inferior to himself.

The second	much to prove his daring in the sig
tells	panions, his mind was not yet suffic up to shake off all reast
com-	up to shake off all respect, and he and but calmiv, "Well Sic C Contraction of the local division of the loc	but calmly, "Well, Sir Count, give
de.	tience, and you shall hear. But my self	told my own way or not at But my orth	told my own way, or not at all. We heir	and my voice was f
d in	nau's horse as he and hooting Mon
vig-	tage of the confusion by, and then but	upon his parson and among his lac
est.	brake, which line betweenty min into
do;	river-You know where Le Croix d
bey	river-You know where I mean, mons
ain	"No truly," answered the statesman led	could have sparshed his the forest was a yood one with all your ea tri-	"You shall have in went it not for his	freebootes around in good time," a ie;	Lone, "As you may Et that more fa
88	enough in the forest say, St. rierman's br
W.e
est	toe for the packet-ay, and looked in we found it no where d a
-	was, that an arquebuse, though a very a
lip	on, and pleasant serviceable company
d.	brawl and battle, talks too lond for and the second second	and any same too loud for see

Montagne's ribs before, and the point shining out between his blade-bones behind. It was done in the twinkling of an eye "

"He is a gallant youth," said Chavigni ; "he always was from a boy ; but where is your wounded companion ?"

"Wounded !" cried the Norman. "Odds life! he's dead. It was enough to have killed the devil. There he lies, poor fellow, wrapped in his cloak. Will you please to look upon him, Sir Counsellor?" and suatching up one of the torches, he approached the spot where the dead man lay, under a bank covered with withered brushwood and stunted trees.

Chavigni followed with a slow step and gloomy brow, the robbers drawing back at his approach; for though they held high birth in bot little respect, the redoubted name and fearless bearing of the statesman had power over even their ungoverned spirits. He, however, who had been called Pierrepont Le Blanc by the tall Norman, twitched his companion by the sleeve as he lighted Chavigni on. "A coward hound, Norman!" whispered he—" thou hast felt'the lash—a cow'ed hound !"

The Norman glanced on him a look of fire, but passing on in silence, he disengaged the mantle from the corpse, and displayed the face of his dead companion, whose calm closed eyes and unruffled features might have been supposed to picture quiet sleep, had not the ashy paleness of his check, and the drop of the underjaw, told that the soul no longer tenanted its earthly dwelling. The bosom of the unfortunate man remained open, in the state in which his comrades had left it, after an ineffectual attempt to give him aid; and in the left side appeared a small wound, where the weapon of his opponent had found entrance, so trifling in appearance, that it seemed a marvel how so little a thing could overthrow the prodigious strength which those limbs announced, and rob them of that hardy spirit which animated them some few hours before.

Chavigni gazed upon him, with his arms crossed upon his breast, and for a moment his mind wandered far into those paths, to which such a sight naturally directs the course of our ideas, till, his thoughts losing themselves in the uncertainty of the void before them, by a sudden effort he recalled them to the business in whibh he was immediately engaged.

"Well, he has bitterly explated the disobedience of my commands; but tell me." he said, turning to the Norma, who still continued to hold the torch over the dead man, "how is it ye have dared to force my servant to show himself and may increase in this attack, contrary to my special order V

"That is easily told," answered the Norman, a suming a tone equally bold and perempting with that of the statesman. "Thus it stands, Sa Con you men of quality often employ us nobility of now in the green forest, not at council-board, to prate of daring."

Chavigni's dignity, like his prudence, became lost in his anger. "Boasting Norman coward!" cried he, "who had not even courage when he saw his leader slain before his face--"

The Norman threw the torch from his hand and drew his weapon; but Chavigni's sword sprang in a moment from the scabbard. He was, perhaps, the best swordsman of his day; and before his servant (who advanced, calling loudly to Lafemas to come forth from the wood where he had remained from the first) could approach, or the robbers could show any signs of taking part in the fray, the blades of the statesman and the freebooter had crossed, and, maugre the Norman's vast strength, his weapon was instantly wrenched from his hand, and, flying over the heads of his companions, struck against the bank above.

Chavigni drew back, as if to pass his sword through the body of his opponent; but the moment he had been thus engaged, gave time for reflection on the imprudence of his conduct, and calmly returning his sword to its sheath, "Thou art no coward, after all," said he, addressing the Norman in upon the singer, which dareither for the music or me a his "You sing about prey," or ill, cluded the last stanza of hi heart, prey, and yet you are no go may judge from to-day." "And why not, Monsieur ht but es but demanded the Norman, with ding a ill-humour in his countenanc ditty, to have called you Monsieur eless not Mr. White .- Nay, do not 1-5-10 I speak but of your beard, not art thou still grumbling, becau young count's throat outright ? . " Nay, not for that," answer because we have lost the best want of his being well seconded "You lie, paruleu !" cried th his sword, and fixing his thumb three inches from the point. " youth so much of my iron toot tave sent it through him, if his b ed him away.

place, gave some awkward assistance; when suddenly the Norman stopped, put his hand to his car, to and his hearing amid the cracking of the wood and the roaring of the flames, and exclaimed, "I hear horse upon the hill-follow me, monseigneur. St. Patrice guide us! this is a bad business: follow me!" So saying, three steps brought him to the flat below, where his companions were still engaged in gathering together all they had left on the ground.

"Messieurs" he cried to the robbers, "leave all useless lumber; I hear horses coming down the hill. It must be a licatenant of the forest, and the gardes champétres, alarmed by the fice-seek your horses, quick i-each his own way. We meet at St. Herman's brake-You, monseigneur, follow me, I will be your guide; but dally not, sir, if, as I guess, you would rather be deemed in the Rue St. Honore, than in the Forest of St. Germain."

So saying, he drew aside the boughs, disclosing a path somewhat to the right of that by which Chavigni had entered their retreat, and which apparentity led to the high sand cliff which flanked it on the

And and a second se	Perpiguan p, him your
and the second division of the second divisio	Perpigaan m him your 11 m	"Pardie !" cried the of fore me of do for your at I very	him the Cried at
n. I h	fore than I do for the of n, I had	him than I do for you. I fore me on forest me treat him as torest ground fore me on forest ground treat him as such."
	Ware
avalry	why good to exclain
rairy	"hy thou days see thee h
8(35	dare arest as soon and	why good to see the b why thou darest as soon to "I dare pass my sword" there need," answered the him," old	thow weed, anon sword
big	his come the ered the arm,	him." stand you asid
ght,	there oned," answered the they come,-stand you aside him," Approaching steps, and a thick screen of wood alara
GW-	thick a stor bound screen of ments, and a
my.	Soughs were C wood alread
nd I	person alon forced hash is ce	boughs were forced back by person along the narrow Waiting those for the Dat
17	arrival of those for whom the waiting.
8	Why, it is
8	a deep vois as dark and
	"Why, it is as dark as the pit a deep voice among the trees. See the light I saw from above cloak," As the back that ye Chauvelin, hold back that bound armed. As the speed back that bound cleat velin, hold to from about the second se	cloak," As and back that armed As the spect that bond

bigh road to St. Germain.

.

.

.

•

.

.

as they ground their unwilling way through the less practicable parts of the forest round.

At times, too, a groan from the lips of their wounded companion interrupted the silence, as the roughness of the way jolted the ponderous vehicle in which he was carried, and reawakened him to a sense of pain.

Long ere they had reached St. Germain, night had fallen over their road, and nothing could be distinguished by those within the carriage, but the figures of the two horsemen who kept close to the windows. The interior was still darker, and it was only a kind of inarticulate sob from the other side which made the marchioness inquire, "Pauline! you are not weeping ?".

The young lady did not positively say whether she was or not, but replied in a voice which showed her mother's conjecture to be well founded.

"It was not thus, mamma," she said, "that I had hoped to arrive at St. Germain."

"Fie, fie! Pauline," replied the old lady; "I have long tried to make you feel like a woman, and you are still a child, a weak child. These accidents, and worse than those, occur to every one in the course of life, and they must be met with fortitade. Have your flattered yourself that you would be exempt from the common sorrows of humanity "

"But if he should die?" said Pauline, with the tone of one who longs to be southed out of their fears. The old lady, however, applied no such unction to the wound in her daughter's heart. Madame de Beaumont had herself been reared in the school of adversity; and while her mind and principles had been thus strengthened and confirmed, her feelings had not been rendered more acute. In the present instance, whether she spoke it heedlessly, or whether she intended to destroy one passion by exciting another, to cure Pauline's grief by rousing for aggr, her answer afforded but little consola tion. "If he dies," said she, dryly, "why I suppose the fair lady, whose picture he has in his bosom, would weep, and you-"

A deep groan from their wounded companion broke in upon her speech, and suggested to the marchioness that he might not be quite so insensible as he seemed. Such an answer, too, was not so palatable to Pauline as to induce her to urge the conversation any farther; so that silence again resumed her empire over the party, remaining undiaturbed till the old lady drawing back the curtain, announced that they were entering St. Germain.

A few minutes more brought them to the lodging of the Count de Blenau ; and here the marchioness descending, gave all the necessary directions in order that the young gentleman might be carried to his sleeping-chamber in the easiest and most convenient method; while Pauline, without profiering any nid, sat back in a dark corner of the carriage. Nor would any thing have shown that she was interested in what passed around her, save when the light of a torch glaring into the vehicle, discovered a handkerchief pressed over her eyes to hide the tears she could not restrain.

As soon as the count was safely lodged in his own dwelling, the carriage proceeded towards the palace, which showed but little appearance of regal state. However the mind of Pauline might have been accustomed to picture a court in all the gay and splendid colouring which youthful imagination leads to anticipated pleasure, her thoughts were now far too fully occupied to admit of her noticing the long. ly and deserted appearance of the scene But to Madame de Beaumont it was different. She who remembered St. Germain in other days, looked in vain for the lights flashing from every window the paince; for the servants hurrying along ferent avenues, the sentinels parading before e entrance, and the gay groups of courtiers and all the brilliant costume of the time, whi crowd the terrace and gardens to enjoy the the evening after the sun had gone down.

All that she remembered had had its day; thing remained but silence and solitude. sentry at the principal gate was all that it the dwelling of a king; and it was not till riage had passed under the archway, that attendant presented himself to inquire wi the comers at that late hour.

The principal domestic of Madame de Be who had already descended from his horse, name of his lady with all ceremony, and alex ed a card (as he had been instructed by the r ness.) on which her style and title were fi played. The royal servant bowed low, say the queen his mistress had expected the r ness before; and seizing the rope of a gre which hung above the staircase, he rang suc that the empty galleries of the palace re kind of groaning echo to the rude clang white ed to mock their loneliness.

Two or three more servants appeared in to the bell's noisy summons; yet such was paucity of attendants, that Madame de Be even while she descended from her carris began to ascend the "grand escaliar," had look, from time to time, at the splendic paintings which decorated the walls, a crowns and deurs-de-lis with which all the were ornamented, before she could satisfy that she really was in the royal château of main.

Pauline's eyes, fixed on the floor, wander to any of the objects round, yet, perhaps, spaciousness of the palace, contrasted w scarcity of its inhabitants, might cast even tional degree of gloom over her mind, sadd it already was by the occurrences of Doubless, in the remote parts of Langued Pauline de Beaumont had hitherto dwe sions of a court had come floating upon imagination like the lamps which the Hindoos commit to the waters of the Ganges, casting a wild and uncertain light upon the distant prospect; and it is probable that even if St. Germain had possessed all its former spleudour, Pauline, would still have been disappointed, for youthful imagination always outrivals plain reality; and besides there is an unpleasing feeling of solitude communicated by the aspect of a strange place, which detracts greatly from the first pleasure of novelty. Thus there were a thousand reasons why Mademaiselle de Beaumont, as she followed the attendant through the long empty galleries and vacant chambers of the palace towards the apartments prepared for her mother and herself, felt none of those happy sensations which she had anticipated from her arrival at court : nor was it till on entering the antechamber of their suite of rooms, she beheld the gay smiling face of her Lyonaise waiting-maid, that she felt there was any thing akin to old recollections within those cold and pompous walls which seemed to look upon her us a stranger.

The soubrette had been sent forward the day before with a part of the Marchioness de Beaumont's equipage; and now, having endured a whole day's comparative silence with the patience and fortitude of a martyr, she advanced to the two ladies with loquacity in her countenance, as if resolved to make up, as speedily as possible, for the restraint under which her tongue had laboured during her short sojourn in the palace; but the deep gravity of Madame de Beaumont, and the melancholy air of her daughter, checked Louise in full career; so that, having kissed her mistress on both cheeks, she paused, while her lip, like an overfilled reservoir, whose waters are trembling on the very brink, seems ready to pour forth the torrent of words which Pauline, as she passed through the enter had so long suppressed.

wiped the last tears from her eyes, and on entering the saloon, advanced towards a mirror which hung between the windows, as if to ascertain what traces they had left behind. The soubrette did not fail to advance, in order to adjust her young lady's dress, and finding herself once more in the exercise of her functions, the right of chattering seemed equally restored; for she commenced immediately, beginning in a low and respectful voice, but gradually increasing as the thought of her mistress was swallowed up in the more comprehensive idea of herself.

"Oh, dear mademoiselle," said she, "I am so glad you are come at last. This place is so sad and so dull? Who would think it was a court? Why, I expected to see it all filled with lords and ladies, and instead of that, I have seen nothing but dismallooking men, who go gliding about in silence, seeming afraid to open their lips, as if that cruel old cardinal, whom they all tremble at, could hear every word they say. I did see one fine-looking gentleman this morning, to be sure, with his servants all in beautiful liveries of blue and gold, and horses as if there were fire coming out of their very eyes; but he rode away to hunt, after he had been half an hour with the queen and Mademoiselle de Hauteford, as they call her."

"Mademoiselle who ?" exclaimed Pauline, quickly, as if startled from her revery by something curious in the name. "Who did you say, Louise ?"

"Ob, such a pretty young lady!" replied the waiting-woman. "Mademoiselle de Hauteford is her name. I saw her this morning as she went to the queen's levee. She has eyes as blue as the sky, and teeth fike pearls themselves; but withal she looks as cold and as proud as if she were the queen's own self."

While the soubrette spoke, Pauline raised her Jacre dark eres to the tall Venetian mirror which fair small hand across 48. fher glossy ringlets that h ally head. But she was tin ansiety; her eyes, too, ginally with a sigh and look o away from the mirror. Vas vention of human vanit or pointment as well as grad Madame de Besumont Pauline; and translating I the instinctive acuteness of ed with more gentleness th are beautiful enough, my Pa a kiss upon her cheek ; styd " Nay, mamma," replied P to fear, either from possess beauty." "Thou art a silly girl, Par mother, "and take these tr beart. Perhaps I was wrong picture. It was but a range even were it tr

RICHVLIEU.

"Nay, mamma," answered Pauline, "my fancy, like an insect, may have been caught in the web of a spider; but the enemy has not yet seized me, and I will break through while I can."

"But, first, let us be sore that we are right," said Madame de Benumont. "For as every rule has its exception, there be some men, whose hearts are even worthy the acceptance of a squeamish girl, who, knowing nothing of the world, expects to meet with purity like her own. At all events, love, De Blenau is the sont of honour, and will not stoop to deceit. In justice, you must not judge without hearing him."

"But," said Pauline, not at all displeased with the refutation of her own ideas, and even wishing, perhaps, to afford her mother occasion to combat them anew..." but..."

The sentence, however, was never destined to be concluded; for, as she spoke, the door of the spartment opened, and a form glided in, the appearance of which instantly arrested the words on Pauline's lips, and made her draw back with an instinctive feeling of respect.

The lady who entered had passed that earlier period of existence when beauties and graces succeed each other without pause, like the flowers of spring, that go blooming on from the violet to the rose. She was in the summer of life, but it was the early summer, untouched by autumn ; and her form, though it possessed no longer the airy lightness of youth, had acquired in dignity a degree of beauty which compensated for the softer loveliness that years had stolen away. Her brown hair fell in a profusion of large curls round a face, which, if not strictly handsome, was highly pleasing; and even many sorrows and reverses, by mingling an expression of patient melancholy with the gentle majesty of her countenance, produced a greater degree of interest than the features could have originally excited.

Those even who sought for mere beauty of feature, would have perceived that her eyes were quick and fine; that her skin was of the most delicate whiteness. except where it was disfigured by the use of rouge; and that her small mouth might have served as model to a stutary, especially while her lips arched with a warm smile of pleasure and affection, as advancing into the apartment, she pressed Madame de Beaumont to her bosom, who on her part, bending low, received the embrace of Anne of Austria with the humble deference of a respectful subject towards the condescension of their sovereign.

"Once more restored to me, my dear Madame de Beaumont!" said the queen. "His Eminence of Richelieu does indeed give me back one of the best of my friends—And this is your Pauline."—She added, turning to Mademoiselle de Beaumont, "You were but young, my fair demoiselle, when last I saw you. You have grown up a lovely flower from a noble root; but truly you will never be spoiled by splendour at our court."

As she spoke, her mind seemed naturally to return to other days, and her eye fixed intently on the ground, as if engaged in tracing out the plan of her past existence, running over all the linos of sorrow, danger, and disappointed hope, till the task became too buter, and she turned to the marchioness with one of those long deep sighs, that almost always follow a review of the days gone by, forming a sort of epitaph to the dreams, the wishes, and the joys, that once were dear, and are no more.

years, he forced to dwell at St. Germain, without guards, without court, without attendants, but such as the Cardinal de Richelieu chooses to allow her. --The Cardinal de Richelieu !" she proceeded, thoughtfully; "the servant of my husband !--but no less the master of his master, and the king of his king."

"I can assure your majesty," replied Madame de Benumont, with a deep tone of feeling which had no hypocrisy in it, for her whole heart was bound by habit, principle, and inclination to her royal mistress-'I can assure your majesty, that many a tear have I shed over the sorrows of my queen ; and when his eminence drove me from the court, I regretted not the splendour of a palace, I regretted not the honour of serving my sovereign, I regretted not the friends I left behind, or the hopes I lost, but I regretted that I could not be the sharer of my mistress's misfortunes .- But your majesty has now received a blessing from Heaven," she continued, willing to turn the conversation from the troubled course of memory to the more agreeable channels of hope-" a blessing which we scarcely dreamed of, a consolation under all present sorrows, and a bright prospect for the years to come."

"Oh, yes, my little Louis, you would say," replied the queen, her face lightening with all a mother's joy as she spoke of her son. "He is indeed a cherub; and sure am I, that if God sends hum years, he will redress his mother's wrongs by proving the greatest of his race."

She spoke of the famous Louis the Fourteenth, and some might have thought she prophesied. But it was only the fervour of a mother's hope, an chalition of that pure feeling, which alone, of all the affections of the heart, the most sordid poverty connot destroy, and the proudest rank can hardly check.

" He is indeed a cherab," continued the queen ; " and such was your Pauline to you, De Beaumout, when the cardinal drove you from my side : a consolation not only in your exile, but also in your mourning for your noble lord. Come near, young lady; let me see if thou art like thy father."

Pauline approached; and the queen laying her hand gently upon her arm, ran her eye rapidly over her face and figure, every now and then pausing for a moment, and scenning to call memory to her aid, in the comparison she was making between the dead and the living. But suddenly she started back, "Sainte Vierge I" cried she, crossing herself," your dress is all dubbled with blood. What bad omen is this ?"

" May it please your majesty," said the marcholness, half smiling at the queen's superstition, for her own strong mind rejected many of the errors of the day, " that blood is only an omen of Pauline's charitable disposition; for in the forest hard by, we came up with a wounded cavalier, and, like a true demoiselle arrante, Pauline rendered him personal aid, even at the expense of her robe."

The door of the apartment at this moment opened, and Anne of Austria, filled with her own peeuliar superstition, stopped in the midst of her speech, and turned her eye anxiously towards it, as if she expected the coming of some ghastly apparition. The figure that entered, however, though it possesced a dignity scarcely earthly, and a calm still grace —an almost inanimate composure, rarely seen in beings agitted by human passions, was nevertheless no form calculated to inspire alarm.

"Oh, Mademoiselle de Hauteford!" cried the queen, her face brightening as she spoke, "De Beaumont, you will love her, for that she is one of my firmest friends."

At the name of De Hauteford, Pauline drew up her slight elegant figure to its full height, with a wild start, like a deer suddenly frightened by some distant sound, and drawing her hand across her forehead, brushed back the two or three dark curls, which had again falleu over her clear fair brow.

"De Hauteford !" cried Anne of Austria, as the young lady advanced, " what has happened ? You look pale-some evil is abroad."

"I would not have intruded on your majesty, or on these lidies," said Mademoiselle de Hanteford, with a graceful but cold inclination of the head towards the strangers, " had it not been that Monseiur Seguin, your majesty's surgeon, requests the favour of an audience immediately. Nor does he wish to be seen by the common attendants; in truth, he has followed me to the antechamber, where he waits your majesty's pleasure."

"Admit him, admit him !" cried the queen. "What can he want at this hour ?"

The surgeon was instantly brought into the presence of the queen by Mademoiselle de Hauteford ; but, after approaching his royal mistress with a profound bow, he remained in silence glancing his eye towards the strangers who stood in the apartment, in such a manner as to intimate that his communication required to be made in private.

"Speak, speak, Seguin !" cried the queen, translating his lock and answering it at once ; " these are all friends, old and dear triends."

" If such be your majesty's pleasure," replied the surgeon, with that sort of short dry voice, which generally denotes a man of few words, "I must inform you at once, that young Count de Blenau has been this morning attacked by robbers, while hunting in the forest, and is severely hurt."

While Seguin communicated this intelligence, Pauline (she scarce knew why.) fixed her eve upon Mademoiselle de Hauteford, whose clear pale cheek, ever almost of the hue of alabaster, showed that it could become still paler. The queen h though the rouge she wore concealed any change of complexion, appeared manifestly agitated. "I told you so, De Beaumont," she exclamed—" that blood foreboded evil: I never knew the sign to fail. This is bad news truly, Seguin," she continued. "Poor De Blenau! surely he will not die."

RICHELLEU.

"I hope not, madam," replied the surgeon ; " I see every chance of his recovery."

"But speak more freely," said the queen. "Have you learned any thing from him? These are all friends, I tell you."

"The count is very weak, madam," answered Seguin, "both from loss of blood and a stunning blow on the head; but he desired me to tell your majesty, that though the wound is in his side, his heart is uninjured!"

"Oh, I understand, I understand," exclaimed the queen. "De Blenau is one out of a thousand : I must write him a note; follow me, Seguin.-Good night, dear Madame de Beaumont. Farewell, Pauline!--Come to my leves to-morrow, and we will talk over old stories and new hopes.--But have a care, Pauline--No more blood upon your robe. It is a bad sign in the house of Austria."

The moment the queen was gone, Pauline pleaded fatigue, and retired to her chamber, followed by her maid Louise, who, be it remarked, had remained in the room during the royal visit.

"This is a strange place, this St. Germain," said the waiting-woman, as she undressed her mistress.

"It is indeed !" replied Pauline. "I wish I had never scen it. But of one thing let me warn you, Louise, before it is too late. Never repeat any thing you may see or hear, while you are at the court; for if you do, your life may answer fo it."

"My life! Mademoiselle Pauline," exclaimed the soubrette, as if she doubted her ears. "Yes indeed, your fife!" replied the young lady:

"Yes indeed, your file !" replied the young lady : "So beware."

"Then I wish I had never seen the place either," rejoined the maid; "for what the use of seeing and hearing things, if one may not talk about them T--and who can be always watching one's tongue I"

RICHKLIEU.

wiped the last tears from her eyes, and on entering the saloon, advanced towards a mirror which hung between the windows, as if to ascertain what traces they had left behind. The souhrette did not fail to advance, in order to adjust her young lady's dress, and finding herself once more in the exercise of her functions, the right of chattering seemed equally restored, for she commenced immediately, beginring in a low and respectful voice, but gradually increasing as the thought of her mistress was swallowed up in the more comprehensive idea of herself.

"Oh, dear mademoiselle," said she, "I am so glad you are come at last, This place is so sad and so dult? Who would thuk it was a court? Why, I expected to see it all filled with lords and ladies, and instead of that, I have seen orthing but dismillooking men, who go gliding about in silence, seeming afraid to open their lips, as if that sruel old cardinal, when they all tremble at, could hear every word they say. I did see one fine-looking gentleman this morning, to be sure, with his servants all in beautiful liveries of blue and gold, and horse as if there were fire coming out of their very eyes; but he rode away to hunt, after he had been half an hoar with the queen and Mademoiselle de Hauteford, as they call her."

"Mademoiselle who ?" exclaimed Pauline, quickly, as if startled from her revery by something curious in the name. "Who did you say, Louise ?"

"Oh, such a pretty young lady !" replied the waiting-woman. "Mademoiselle de Hanteford is her name. I saw her this morning as she went to the quern's levee. She has eyes as blue as the sky, and toeth like pearls themselves; but withal she looks as cold and as proud as if she were the queen's own self."

While the soubrette spoke, Pauline raised her Jargo dark eyes to the tall Venetian mirror which stood before her, and which had never reflected any thing lovelier thas hereelf, as hastily she passed her fair small hand across her brow, brushing back the glossy ringlets that hang clustering over her forehead. But she was tired and pale with faitgue and anxiety; her eyes, too, bore the traces of tears, and with a sigh and look of dissatisfaction, she turned away from the mirror, which, like every other invention of human vanity, often procures us disappointment as well as gratification.

RICHEZIEU.

Madame de Besumont's eyes had been fixed upon Pauline; and translating ber daughter's looks with the instinctive acteness of a mother, she approached with more gentleness than was her wont. "You are beautiful enough my Pauline," said she, pressing a kiss upon her cheek; "you are beautiful enough. Do not fear."

"Nay, mamma," replied Pauline, "I have nothing to fear, either from possessing or from wanting beauty."

"Thou art a silly girl, Pauline," continued her mother, " and take these triffes far too much to heart. Perhaps I was wrong concerning this same picture. It was but a random guess. Bosides, even were it true, where were the mighty harm? These men are all alike. Pauline.—like butterflies, they rest on a thousand flowers before they settle on any one. We all fancy that our own lover is different from his fellows; but, believe me, my child, the best happiness a woman can boast, is that of being most carefully deceived."

"Then no such butterfly love for me, mamma," replied Pauline, her check slightly colouring as she spoke. "I would rather not know this sweet poison -love. My heart is still free, though my fancy may have-have-"

"May have what. Pauline ?" demanded her mother, with a doubtful smile. " My dear child, shy heart, and thy fancy, I trow, have not been so acparate as thou thinkest."

RICHELLEU.

it was complete, although Philip heard his wife read it over with no small satisfaction, and doubtless thought it as pretty a piece of oratory as ever was penned.

It is now unfortunately lost to the public, and all that can be satisfactorily vouched upon the subject is that it was calculated to convey to the Count de Blenau all the information which the woodcutter possessed, although that information might be clothed in homely language, without much perfection, either in writing or orthography.

When it had been read, and re-read, and twisted up according to the best conceit of the good couple, it was entrasted to Charles, the woodman's boy, with many a charge and direction concerning its delivery. For his part, glad of a day's sport, he readily undertook the task, and driving the laden mule before him, set out, whistling on his way, to St. Germain's. He had not, however, proceeded far, when he was overtaken by Philip with new directions; the principal one being to say, if any one should actually see him deliver the note, and make inquiries, that it came from a lady. "For," said Philip, - and he thought the observation was a shrewed one, - "so handsome a youth as the young count must have many ladies who white to him.

Charles did not very well comprehend what it was all about, but he was well comprehend what it merve the young count, who had given him many a kind word and a piece of silver, when the hunting parties of the court had stopped to water their horset at the abremoir. The boy was diligent and active, and soon reached St. Germain. His next task was to find out the lodging of the Count de Blenau : and, after looking about for some time, he addressed himself, for information, to a stout, jorkal-looking servat, who was suntering down the street, guing about at the various hotels, with a look of easy nonchalance, as if idleness was his employment.

I should suppose the count does not himself, at all, "replied the boy, putting tion aside with all the shrewdness of peasant; "but, perhaps, his cook will." " Suppose 1 buy your wood, my man," servant. "Why, you are very welcome, sir," anal youth ; "but if you do not want it, I pray honesty, show me which is the Count de " Well, I will show thee," said the serv am e'en going thither myself, on the part Marquise de Beaumout, to ask after the + Oh, then, you are one of those who wer the carriage yesterday, when he was woun the wood," exclaimed the boy. "Now I rem your colours. Were you not one of those on back 7" "Even so," answered the man; "and if I not, thou art the woodman's boy. But come, pri tell us what is thy real errand with the are all his friends .

"I do not know what you mean by Mercury," rejoined the boy.

"Why he was a great man in his day," replied the servant, "and, as I take it, used to come and go between the gods and goddesses; notwihistanding which, Monsieur Rubens, who is the greatest painter that ever lived, has painted this same Mercury as one of the late queens" council, but nevertheless he was a carrier of messages, and so forth."

"Why, then, thou art more Mercury than I, for thou carriest a message, and I a letter," answered the boy, as they approached the hotel of the count, towards which they had been bending their steps during this conversation. Their proximity to his dwelling, in all probability, saved the woodman's son from an angry answer; for his companion did not seem at all pleased with having the name of Mercury retorted upon himself; and intending strongly to impress upon the woodman's boy that he was a person of far too great consequence to be jested with, he assumed a tone of double pomposity towards the servant who appeared on the steps of the hotel. " Tell Henry de la Mothe, the count's page," said the servant, " that the Marquise de Beaumont has sent to inquire after his master's bealth."

The servant retired with the message, and in a moment after Henry de la Mothe himself appeared, and informed the messenger that his master was greatly better. He had slept well, he said, during the night; and his surgeons assured him that the wounds which he had received were likely to produce no farther harm than the weakness naturally consequent upon so great a loss of blood as that which he had sustained. Having given this message on his master's account, Henry, on his own, the count's page, pressed his linger on hi that it was to be given privately, am himself from them, without waiting to I ed, drove back his mule through the le parts of the forest, and rendered an acco father of the success of his expedition. " Who can that note be from ?" said the ness de Beaumont's servant to Henry de "The boy told me it came from a lndy." " Froni Mademoiselle de Hauteford, p replied the page, thoughtfully. "I must j my master without defay, if he be strong e read it. We will talk more another di friend ;" and he left him. "From Mademoiselle de Hauteford !" man "Oh, ho !"-and he went home to te knew to Louise, the soubrette.

* Allading, no doubt, to the picture of the r conciliation of Mary de Medicis and her son Louis XIII, in which Mercury seems hand in glove with the cardinals and statesmen of the day.

CHAPTER VI.

The Marquis de Cinq Mars, the Count de Fontrailles, and King Louis the Thirteenth, all making fools of themselves in their own way.

THERE are some spots on the earth which seem marked out as the scene of extraordinary events, and which, without any peculiar beauty, or other intrinsic quality to recommend them, acquire a transcendent interest, as the theatre of great actions. Such is Chantilly, the history of whose walls might furnish many a lay to the poet, and many a moral to the sage; and even now, by its magnificence and its decay, it offers a new comment on the vanity of splendour, and proves, by the forgotten greatness of its lords, how the waves of time are the true waters of oblivion.

But that as it may, Montmorency, Conde, are names so worker in the web of history, that nothing can tear them out, and these were the lords of Chantilly. But among all that its roof has sheltered, no one, perhaps, is more worthy of notice than Louis the Thirteenth: the son of Henry the Fourth, and Mary de Medicis, born to an inheritance of high talents and high fortune, with the inspiring incidement of a people's love.

It is said that circumstance—that stumbling-block of great minds-that confounder of deep-laid schemes --that httle, mighty, unseen controller of all man's actions, should find pleasure in bending to its will, that which Nature originally seemed to place above its sway. Endued with all the qualities a throne requires, brave, wise, clear-sigkted, and generous; with his mother's talents and his father's courage, as unworthy a farther effort. He struggled for that appearance of royal state which i minister was unwilling to allow him; and at Chantilly, passed his time in a thousan amusements, which but served to hurry by interval at this time, that the first news of t dingl de Richelsen's illness began to be noised His health had long been declining ; but so was that redoutable minister, that though un and the deepening lines apon his pale cheep tyrant of both king and people was falling und away of a still stronger hand. The moraing was

The morning was yet in its prime. The gray had hardly rolled away from the old towers and thements of the Châleau of Chantilly, which au spot, offered then little but strong fortified walls on the long grass in the same even to the present day. So, if saur-kraut did all this, surely I may return to Philip, the woodman of Mantes.

MICHELIEU

Chavigni, as we have seen, cast his purse upon the ground, and rode away from the cottage of the woodman, hittle heeding what so insignificant an agent might do or say. Yet Philip's first thought was one which would have procured him speedy admission to the Bastille, had Chavigni been able to divine its nature. "The young count shall know all about it," said Philip to himself. "That's a great rogue in Isabel and silver, for all his fine clothes, or I'm much mistaken."

His next object of attention was the purse ; and after various pros and cons. Inclination, the best logician in the world, reasoned him into taking it, "For," said Philip, "dirty fingers soil no gold ;" and having carefully put it into his pouch, the woodman laid his finger upon the side of his nose, and plunged headlong into a deep meditation concerning the best and least suspicious method of informing the young Count de Blenau of all he had seen, heard, or suspected. We will not follow the course of this cognition, which, as it doubtless took place in the French tongue, must necessarily suffer by translation, but taking a short cut straight through all the zigzags of Philip's mind, arrive directly at the conclusion, or rather at the consequences, which were these. In the first place, he commanded his son Charles to load the mule with wood, notwithstanding the boy's observation, that no one would buy wood at that time of the morning, or rather the night; for, to make use of Shakspeare's language, the morn, far from being yet clad in any russet mantle, was snugly wrapped up in the blanket of the dark, and snoring away, fast asleep, like her betters.

Precisely in the same situation as Aurora, that is to say, soundly sleeping, till her ordinary hour of rising, was Joan, the woodman's wife. Philip, however, by sundry efforts, contrived to awaken her to ing of God, 1 di The wife readily obeyed; for Philip, kind as the air of spring, had a high notion privilezes, and did not often suffer his com be disputed within his little sphere of d However, it seemed a sort of tenue by w sway was held, that Joan, his wife, should all his secrets; and accordingly, in the pre stance, the good woodman related in so prolix style, not only all that had passed b Chavigni and Lafemas in the house, but m what they had said before they even knocked donr. "For you must know, Joan," said he, " could not sleep for thinking of all this day work ; and, as I lay awake, I heard horses st the water, and people speaking, and very soon they said made me wish to hear more, which as I have told you. And now, Joan I think it. as a Christian and a man, to let this young cay know what they are plotting against him. thee down ; here is a pen and ink, and out of the boy's holy c

"Whoever dreated of hearing you say so !" said his companion. "All France agrees with by you, no doubt; but all thought that the Marquise de Cinq Mars either loved the cardinal, or feared him, too much to see his crimes."

Fear him !" exclaimed Cinq Mars, the blood mounting to his check, as if the very name of fear wounded his sense of honour. He then paused, looked into his real feelings, shook his head mournfully, and after a moment sinterval of bitter silence, added, "True! true! Who is there that does not fear him ? Nevertheless, it is impossible to see one's country bleeding for the merciless cruelty of one man, the prisons filled with the best and bravest of the land to quiet his suspicions, and the king held in worse bondage than a slave to gratify the daring ambition of this insatiate chu.chman, and not to wish that Heaven had sent it otherwise."

It is not Heaven's fault, sir," replied Fontrailles; "it is our own, that we do suffer it. Had we one man in France who, with sufficient courage, talent, and influence, had the true spirit of a patriot, our unhappy country might soon be freed from the bondage under which she groans."

"But where shall we find such a man ?" asked the master of the horse, either really not understanding the aim of Fontrailles, or wishing to force hun to a clearer explanation of his purpose. "Such an undertaking as you hint at," he continued, "must be well considered, and well supported, to have any effect. It must be strengthened by wit, by courage, and by illustrious names. It must have the power of wealth, and the power of reputation. It must be the rousing of the hon with all his force, to shrike off the toils by which he is encompassed."

 But still there must be some one to rouse him," said Fontrailles, fixing his eyes on Cinq Mars with a pecultar expression, as if to denote that he was the man alluded to. "Suppose this were France," he proceeded, unbackling his sword from the belt, and drawing a few lines on the ground with the

into their solitude for protect ing but for opportunity." and out to opportunity. And here, said Cinq Mars, with a melancl smile, following the example of his companion, a pointing out with his sword, as if on a map, the st posed situations of the various places to which referred-"And here is Peronne, and Rouen, and Havre, and Lyons, and Tours, and Breat, and Bo deaux, and every town or fortress in France, filled with his troops and governed by his creatures; and ere is Flanders, with Chaunes and Mielleray, and teen thousand men, at his disposal; and here is ally, with Buillon, and as many more, ready to Bat suppose I could show, said Fontrailles, layhis hand on his companion's arm, and detaining as he was about to walk on --- but suppose d show that Mielleray would not march,-that lon would declare for us,-that England would with money, and Spain would put five th Mars waved him; and now it came like a ray of sunshine through a cloud, brightening the prospect which had been before in shadow. "Think you the king would consent ?"

"Assurelly !" replied his companion. "Does he not hate the cardinal as much as any one ? Does not his blood boil under the bonds he cannot break 1 And would he not bless the min, who gave him freedom ? Think, Cinq Mars !" he continued, endeavouring to throw much energy into his manner, for he knew that the ardent mind of his companion wanted but the spark of enthusiasm to influme— "think, what a glernous object! to free alike the people and their sovereign, and to rescue the many victims even now destined to prove the tyrant's crueity ! Think, think of the glorious reward, the thanks of a king, the gratitude of a nation, and the blessings of thousands saved from dungeons and from death !"

It worked as he could have wished. The enthusiasm of his words had their full effect on the mind of his companion. As the other went on, the eye of Cinq Mars lightened with all the wild ardour of his nature; and striking his hand upon the hilt of his sword, as if longing to draw it in the inspiring cause of his country's liberty, "Glorious indeed !" he archamed—" glorious indeed !"

Bat immediately after, fixing his glance upon the ground, he fell into meditation of the many circumstances of the times; and ashis mind's eye ran over the difficulties and dangers which surrounded the enterprise, the enthusinsm which had beamed in his eye, like the last flash of an expiring fire, died away, and he replied, with a sigh, "What you have described, sir, is indeed a glorious form—but it is dead—it wants a soul. The king, though every thing great and noble, has been too long governed now to act for himself. The Duke of Orleans is weak and undeedeed as a child. Bouillon is far away—"

"And where is Cing Mars ?" demanded Fontrail-

ung at its head and upport." In these peaceable days, when we are pray against privy conspiracy, both as a c misfortune, the very name is startling to a dox ears ; but at the time I speak of, it had effect. Indeed, from the commencement ware between Henri Quatre and the Leagu else had existed but a succession of comp which one after another had involved every guished person in the country, and brough than one noble head to the block. Men's had become so accustomed to the sound, th explosion of a new plot scarcely finished matt a day's wouder, as the burghers of a besieger at length hardly hear the maring of the ca against their walls; and so common had bee the name of conspirator, that there were very men in the realm who had not acquired a just to such an appellation. The word "conspiracy," therefore, carried a ing harsh or diangreeable to the mind of Cinq M What Fontrailles proposed to him h aspect.

"if he has done as you say, be still his friend. Forget your country in your gratitude ; though in the days of ancient virtue patriotism was held paramount. We must not hope for such things now ; so no more of that. But if I can show that this proud minister has never served you; if I can prove that every honour which of late has fallen upon you, far from being a bounty of the cardinal, has proceeded solely from the favour of the king, and has been wrung from the hard churchman as a mere concession to the monarch's whim ; if it can be made clear that the Marquis Cinq Mars would now have been a Duke and Constable of France. had not his kind friend the cardinal whispered he was unfit for such an office,-then will you have no longer the excuse of friendship, and your country's call must and shall be heard."

"I can scarce credit your words, Fontrailles," replied cing Mars. "You speak boldly, but do you speak truly !"

" Most traly, on my life!" replied Fontrailles. "Think you, Cinq Mars, if I did not well know that I could prove each word I have said, that thus I would have placed my most hidden thoughts in the power of a man who avows himself the friend of Richelieu I"

"Prove to me, --but prove to me, that I am not bound to him in gratitude," cried Cinq Mars, vehemently; "take from me the bonds by which he has chined my honour, and I will hurl him from his height of power, or die in the attempt."

"Hush " exclaimed Fontrailles, faying his finger on his lip as they turned into another alley; " we are no longer alone. Govern yourself, Cinq Mars, and I will prove every title of what I have advanced are we be two hours older."

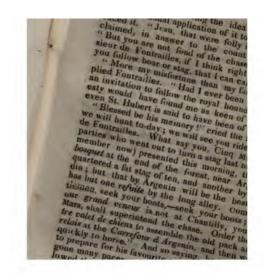

This was uttered in a low tone of volce; for there was indeed another group in the same avenue with themselves. The party, which was rapidly approaching, consisted of three persons, of whom one was a step in advance, and, though in no degree period, but more particularly used by the sport editor of the sport of

ment, which was often the case, there was degree of dignity in his manner that see the vas his mante feeling of their empthat seema to consciousness of how inferior they were, bi times appeared handsome, but junct ert dreaming even now of the block of with a kind and familiar air, he pon his favourite's arm: who on his of the monarch had read his thoughts doom.

has sometimes lost or won an ems than a single word, if we may bery of Darius's horse, who, being a animal than Balaam's ars, served out speaking However, Fontrailson Cinq Mars, and seeing plainly us's speech, he hastened to wipe it culate petty dangers in a great unihe, "were as weak as to think some may meet with in the chase, n horseback."

ars and the king were passionately forest sport, so that the similie of directly home, more especially to

LICHELINU.

It is possible that at that moment his mind was engaged in calculating all that such an event as the death of Richelieu would produce ; for, gradually, as if he dreamed of ruling for himself, and as hope out before him many a future year of power and greatness, his air became more dignified, his eyes flashed with its long repressed fire, and his step acquired a new degree of firmness and majesty.

Fontrailles watched the alteration of the kind's countenance, and, skilful at reading the mind's workings by the face, he added, as if finishing the sentence which Louis had left uncoorcluded,—but taking care to blend what he said with an air of raillery towards the master of the horse, lest he should offend the irritable monarch—" And then," said he, " Cinq Mars shall be a duke. Is it not so, sire f?"

Louis started. His thoughts had been engaged in far greater schemes; and yet rewarding his friends and favourates always formed a great part of the pleasure he anticipated in power, and he replied, without anger, " Most likely it will be so--Indeed," he added, " had my wishes, as a man, been followed," and he turned kindly towards the master of the horse,—" it should have been so long ago, Cinq Mars. But kings, you know, are obliged to yield their private inclinations to what the state requires."

Fontrailles glanced his eyes towards the grand ecuyer, as if desiring him to remark the king's words. Cinq Mars bent his head, in token that he comprehended, and replied to the king: "I understand your majesty; but, believe me, sire, no honour or distinction could more bind Cinq Mars to his king, than duty, gratitude, and affection do at this moment."

"I believe thee, friend, --I believe thee, from m soul," said Louis. "God forgive us that we should desire the death of any man! and surely do not I that of the cardinal, for he is a good minister, and man of powerful mind. But, withal, we may with that he was more gentle and forgiving. Nevertheless, he is a great man. See how he thwarts and rules half the kings in Europe-See how he presses the emperor, and our good brother-in-law, Philip of Spain; while the great Gustavus, this northern hero, is little better than his general."

RICHELIES.

"He is assuredly a great man, sire," replied Cinq Mars. "But permit me to remark, that a great bad man is worse than one of less talents, for he has the extended capability of doing harm; and perhaps, sire, if this minister contented himself with thwarting kings abroad, he would do better than by opposing the will of his own sovereign at home."

The time, however, was not yet come for Louis to make even an attempt towards liberating himself from the trammels to which he had been so long accustomed. Habit in this had far more power over his mind than even the vast and aspiring talents of Richelieu. No man in France, perhaps, more contenned or hated the cardinal than the royal slave whom he had so long subjugated to his burdensome sway. Yet Louis, amid all his dreams for the future, looked with dread upon losing the support of a man whom he detested, but upon whose counsels and abilities he had been accustomed to rely with confidence and security.

Cinq Mars saw plainly the state of his master's mind; and as he entered the palace, he again began to doubt whether he should at all lend himself to the bold and dangerous measures which Fontrailles had suggested.

RICHELLEU.

88

CHAPTER VII.

In which is shown how a great king buoted a great besst; and what came of the huoting.

WHILE the king's mind, as he returned to the Chateau de Chantilly, was agitated by vague hopes and fears, which, like the forms that we trace in the clouds, rolled into a thousand strange and almost palpable shapes before his mind's eye, and yet were but a vapour after all ; and while the thoughts of Cinq Mars ran over all the difficulties and dangers of the future prospect, reverted to the obligations Richelieu had once conferred upon him, or scanned the faults and crimes of the minister, till the struggle of patriotism and gratitude left nothing but doubt behind : the imagination of Fontrailles was very differently occupied. It was not that he pondered the means of engaging more firmly the wavering mind of (ing Mars, No, for he had marked him for his own : and from that morning's conversation, felt as sure of his companion as the ant-lion does of the insect he sees tremble on the edge of his pit. Neither did he revolve the probable issue of the dangerous schemes in which he was engaging both himself and others; for he was confident in his powers of disentangling himself, when it should become necessary to his own safety so to do, and he was not a man to distress himself for the danger of his friends. The occupation of his mind, as they approached the castle, was of a more personal na. ture. The truth is, that so far from discomposing dreaming that he should be called upon to gi ther proof of his veneration for the royal spin He saw plainly, however, that his case add of no remedy. Go he most; and having et philosophy in his nature to meet inevitable with an ubshrinking mind, he prepared to enc ter all the horrors of the chase, as if they wer He accordingly got into his boots with as m alacrity as their nature permitted, for, each wei ing fully eight pounds, they were somewhat pond ous and unmanageable. He then hastily loaded issents, stuck his conteau de chasse in his belt, a browing the feather from his hat, was the lit "Why, how is this, Monsieur de Fontrailles ? id the king, who in a few minutes joined him it e area where the horses were assembled. "The et at your post in You are, indeed, keen for the rt. Some one see for Cinq Mars -- On ! here he nes : Moant, gentlemen, moant ! Om he chase and lieutenant-said the master of the horse, with a bitter expression of displeasure in his manner; "and that Claude de Blenau could inform your majesty."

"I know not what you mean, cinq Mars," answered the king. "De Blenau is a gallant cavalier; as stauch to his game as a beagle of the best; and though he shows more service to our queen than to ourself, he is no less valued for that."

"He is one cavalier out of ten thousand—" replied Cinq Mars, warmly; "my dearest companion and friend; and while Cinq Mars has a sword to wield, De Blenau shall never want one to second his quarrel."

" Why, what ails thee, Cinq Mars ?" demanded the king, with some surprise. "Thou art angry,-what is it now ?"

"It is, sire," replied the master of the horse, "that I have just had a courier from St. Germain, who bears me word, that three days since past, the count, as your majesty and I have often done, was hunting in the neighbourhood of Muttes, and was there most treacherously attacked by an armed band, in which adventure he suffered two woonds that nearly drained his good heart of blood. Shall this be tolerated, sire !"

"No, indeed ! no, indeed !" replied the king, with much warmth. "This shall be looked to. Our kingdom must not be overrun with robbers and brigands."

"Robbers!" exclaimed Ginq Mars, indignantly. "I know not-they may have been robbers; but my letters say that one of them wore colours of lanbel and silver."

"Those are the colours of Chavigni's livery," replied the king, who knew the most minute difference in the bearing of every family in the kingdom, with wonderful precision. "This must be looked to, and it shall, or I am not deserving of my name. But now mount, gentlemen, mount! we are waited for at the randerrous."

ramed, or to use the French term, encode surrounding trees. The sun had not yet a ciently to shine upon any of these forest r the sweeping hills and dates beyond we seen through the apertures, richly lighted u clear beams of the morning's though occasi soft wreath of mist, lingering in the bosom of of the hollows, would roll a transient shadow the prospect. Louis had chosen this spot h rendezvous, perhaps as much on account of it turesque beauty as for any other reason. Depu as he was of courtly spleadour and observance mind, unperverted by the giddy show and th pomp that generally surround a royal etation. garded with a degree of entbosiasm the real love Baroon vinn a ungree or encountant the test inte-ness of nature; and now it was some time before even the preparations for his favourile sport con ealt his attention from the picturesque beauty of th Spot. The policy of Richelieu, which has led) prive the king of many of overeignty as well as of some laying out the table for the royal dejoind, and some busily engaged in cutting long straight wands from the more philable sort of trees, and peeling off the bark for a certain distance, so as to leave a sort of hradle or hilt still covered, while the rest of the stick, about three feet in length, remained bare. These, called "balons de chasse," were first presented to the king, who, having chosen one, directed the rest to be distributed among his friends and attendants, for the purpose of guarding their heads from the boughs, which in the rapidity of the chase, while it continued in the forest, often inflicted serious injuries.

The maître calet de chiens and his ordinaries, each armed with a portentous-looking horn, through the circles of which were passed a variety of dog couples, were busily occupied in distributing the hounds into their different relays, and the grooms and other attendents were seen trying the girths of the heavy hunting saddles, loading the pistols, or placing them in the holsters, and endenvouring to distinguish themselves fully as much by their bustle as by their activity.

However, it was an animated scene, and those who saw it could not wonder that Louis preferred the gay excitement of such sports to the sombre monotony of a palace without a court, and royalty without its splendour.

After examining the preparations with a critical eye, and inquiring into the height, age, size, and other distinctive signs of the stag which wis to be hunted. Louis placed himself, as the breakfast table which had been prepared in the midst of the green, and motioning Cinq Mars and Eoptralilies to be scated, entered into a lively discussion concerning the proper apots for placing the relays of horses and dors. At length it was determined that six hounds and four hunters should be stationed at about two leagues and a half on, the high road; that is clus a upon Cinq Mars to communicate i rections to the officers of the hust, which h that sort of jargon which the sports of the i made common in those days, but which would be hardly intelligible. He was engaged in general orders, that the borses should be h the shade and ready to be mounted at a more the shade and ready to obtain the source s notice, in case the king or any of his source s require them, and that the ordinary should means let slip any of the dogs of the rolay upo stag, even if it passed piqueeurs of the principal -when suddenly he stopped, and pointing with band, a man was discovered standing in one of avenues, apparently watching the royal party. The circumstance would have passed without tice, had it not been for the extraordinary stature the intrader, who appeared fully as tall as Cinq M himself. Attention was farther excited by his d appearing as soon as he was observed; and son grooms were sent to bring him before the king, bu their search was in vain, and the matter was soo forgotten. anno 1642, Wonld ces of the day, or the particulars of etiquette usual on such occasions.

The stag, poor silly beast, who had been dozing away his tume in a thicket at about half a unite distance, was soon roused by the very unwished appearance of the huntsmen, and taking his path down the principal avenue, bounded away towards the open country, calcolating, more wisely than the beast recorded by our old friend Æsop, that the boughs might encumber his head-gear. The horns sounded loud, the cooples were unlosed, the dogs slipped, and away went man and beast in the pursuit. For a moment or two the forest was filled with clang, and cry, and tunuit: as the hunt swept away, it grew fainter and fainter, till the sound, almost lost in the indistinct distance, left the deep glades of the wood to resume their original silence.

They did not, however, long appear solitary, for in a few minutes after the hunt had quitted the forest, the same tall figure, whose apparition had interrupted Ging Mars in his oratory concerning the relays, emerged from one of the narrower paths, leading a strong black horse, whose trappings were thickly covered with a variety of different figures in brass, representing the signs of the zodiac, together with sundry triangles, crescents, and other shapes, such as formed part of the astrological quackery of that day. The appearance of the master was not less singular in point of dress than that of the horse. He wore a long black robe, somewhat in the shape of that borne by the order of Black Friars, but sprinkled with silver signs. This, which made him look truly gigantic, was bound round his waist by a broad girdle of while leather, traced all over with strange characters, that might have been called hieroglyphics had they signified any thing : but which were, probably, as unmeaning as the science they were intended to dignify.

To any the truth, the wearer did not seem particularly at his case in his habiliments; for when, effer having looked cautionaly around, he attempted to mount his horse, the long drapery of his gown got entangled round his feet at every effort, and it was not till he had vented several very ungoally execations, and effected a long rent in the back of his robe, that he accomplished the ascent into the saddle. Once there, however, the dexterity of his horsemanship, and his bearing altogether, made him appear much more like the captain of a band of heavy cavalry than an astrologer, notwithstanding the long snowy beard which hung down to his girdle, and the profusion of white locks that, escaping from his fur cap, floated wildly over his face, and concealed the greater part of its features.

The horseman paused for a moment, seemingly immersed in thought, while his horse, being a less considerate beast than himself, kept pawing the ground, eager to set off. "Let me see," said the horseman; "the stag will soon be turned on the high road by the carriers for Clermont, and must come round under the hill, and then I would take the world to a chapon de Maine, that that fool Andrien lets slip his relay, and drives the beast to water. If so, I have them at the Croix de bois. At all events, one must try." And thus speaking, he struck his horse hard with a thick kind of truncheon he held in his hand, and soon was out of the forest.

In the mean while the king and his suite followed close upon the hounds; the monarch and thing Mars, animated by the love of the chase, and Fontrailles risking to break his neck rather than be behind. The road for some way was perfectly unobstructed, and as long as it remained so, the stag followed it without deviation; but at length a train of carriers' wagons appeared, wending their way towards clermont. The jingling of the bells on the yokes of the oxen, and the flanting of the red and white ribands on their horns, instantly startled the stag, who, stopping short in his flight, stood or space for a moment, and then darting across the country sattered a narrow track of that upproductive sandy kind of soil, called in France landes, which bored the forest. It so happened--infortunate ly, going to say, but doubtless the stag thought of wise-that a large herd of his horsed kindred view lying out in this very track, enjoying the more insufficient of the form that place shirted the forest.

RIOSEX Light, a

Now the stag, remembering an old saying, which signalizes the solace of " company in distress," pro ceeded straight into the midst of the herd; wh being fat burghen ood, and like many othe fat burghers som ish withal, far from com passionaling eived him with scant courtesy, and is el him at the devi However, no be lost : the dogs wer close upon his auve qui peut !" was th word among the _____i, an. away they all went, fly ing in every direction.

The hunters had as little cause to be please with this mancuve as the stags; for the hound being young, were deceived by a strong family like ness between one of the herd and the one they ha so long followed, and all of the dogs but four, yield ing up the real object of pursuit, gave chase to th strange stag, who, darting off to the left, took hi way towards the river. Cinq Mars and most of th piqueurs, misled by seeing the young hounds hav so great a majority, followed also. It was in yai the king called to him to come back, that he wa hunting the wrong berst, and was as great a fool r a young hound; he neither heeded nor heard, au soon was out of sight.

" Sa Christi?" cried Louis, "there they go, jui like the world, quitting the true pursuit to follo the first fool that ruas, and priding themselves o being in the right, when they are most in error but come. Monsieur de Fontrailles, we will follou the true stug of the hunt."

But Fontrailies too was gone. The separation of the hounds had afforded an opportunity of quitty followed, gave the exact number of mode followed by the halloo, and the I did route, which the piqueus ordinarily give nonnce that the dog who cried was upon some Suil Fontrailles numerical his superscent. Still Fontrailles pursued his way, v deniy he perceived the stag, who, having o the king, was brought to bay under the ba At that season of the year, the stag is per dangerous, but Fontrailles did not want pe courage, and, dismounting from his horse, he courses, and, common and show when our of to the bottom of the bank ; where, drawin cauteau de classe, he prepared to run in upon breast ; but remembering at the moused to run in upon the same distant he factorization to many and way king coold not be far distant, he paused, and wai till Loois came op, held the stirrup and offered weapon to the monarch, who instantly running presented the knife with all the dexterity of as perienced sportsman, and in a moment lai dead at his feet. rounds, while th Oure ticed in this profound chapter. "Je veux dire, Vive Dieu! What do you want? and who are you ?"

"A friend to the son of Henri Quatre," replied the stranger, advancing his horse closer to the king, who stood gazing on him with no small degree of awe for be it remembered, that the superstitious belief in all sorts of necromancy was at its height both in England and France.

"A friend to the son of Henri Quatre ! and one who comes to warn him of near-approaching dangers."

"What are they, friend ?" demanded the king, with a look of credulous surprise : " Let me know whence they arise, and how they may be avoided, and your reward is sure."

"I seek no reward," replied the stranger, scornfully; " can all the gold of France change the star of my desting? No's monarch, I come uncalled, and I will go unrewarded. The planets are still doubtful over your house, and therefore I forewarn you ere it be too late—A Spaniard is seeking your overthrow, and a woman is plotting your ruin—A prince is scheming your destruction, and a queen is betraying your trust."

"How !" exclaimed Louis. " Am 1 to believe-"

"Ask me no questions," cried the stranger, who heard the trampling of horses' feet approaching the scene of conference, "In this roll is written the word of fate. Read it, O king! and timely guard against the will that menaces." So saying, be threw a scroll of parchment before the king, and spirred on his horse to depart; but at that moment, the figure of Cinq Mars, who by this time had run down the stag he had followed, presented itself in his way. "What mumming in this?" cried the umaster of the horse, regarding the stranger.

"Stop him! Cinq Mars," cried Fontrailles, who foresaw that the stranger's predictions might derauge his schemes. "He is an impostor: do not lot him page!" And at the same time he laid him hand upon the astrologer's bridle. But in a moment, the stranger spurring on his charger, overturned Fontrailles, shivered the hunting sword which Cinq Mars had drawn against him to atoms with one blow of his truncheon, and scattering the grooms and huntsmen like a flock of sheep, was soon out of reach of pursuit.

"What means all this ?" exclaimed Cing Mars; "explain, Fontrailles! Sire, shall we follow you impostor ?"

But Louis's eyes were fixed with a strained gare upon the scroll, which he held in his hand, and which seemed to absorb every faculty in his soul. At length he raised them, mounted his horse in silence, and still holding the parchment tight in his hand, rode on, exclaiming, "To Chantilly."

CHAPTER VIII.

Showing how the green-eyed monster got hold of a young lady's heart, and what he did with it.

Who is there that has not dreamed and had their dream broken? Who is there that has not sighed to see spring-flowers blighted, or summer sunshine yield to wintry clouds; or bright hopes change to dark sorrows, and gay joys pass away like sudden meteors, that blaze for one splendid moment, and then drop powerless into the dark bosom of the night1

If memory, instead of softening all the traces, gave us back the original lines of life in their native harshness, who could live on to old sge? for the catalogue of broken hopes, and disappointed weather and pleasures anitched from us never to return would be more than any human mind could be

It would harden the heart to humble, or break it in its youth. It is happy too, that in early years our mind has greater power of resistance, for the novelty of sorrow gives it a double sting.

The fatigues of her journey had long worn off, and left Pauline de Beaumont all the glow of wild and youthful beaaty, which had adorned her in her native hills. Her cheek had recovered its fine soft blush in all its warmth, and her eyes all their dark brilliancy. But the cheerful gayety which had distinguished her, the light buoyancy of spirit, that seemed destinad to rise above all the sorrow of the world, had not come back with the rose of her cheek, or the lustre of her eye. She loved to be alone, and instead of regretting the gloom and stilness which prevailed in the court of Anne of Austria, she often seemed to find its gayety too much for her, and would retire to the suite of apartments appropriated to her mother and herself, to enjoy the solitude of her own thoughts.

At first, Madame de Beaumont fancied that the melancholy of her daughter was caused by the sudden change from many loved scenes, endeared by all the remembrances of infancy, to others in which, as yet, she had acquired no interest. But as a second week followed the first, after their arrival at St. Germain's, and the same depression of spirits still continued, the marchioness began to fear that Pauline had some more acrious cause of sorrow; and her mind reverted to the suspicions of De Blenau's constancy, which she had been the first to excite in her daughter's bosom.

The coming time is filled with things that we know not, and chance calls forth so many unexpected events, that the only way in life is to wait for Fate, and seize the circumstances of the day; by the errors of the past to correct our actions at present, and to leave the fature to a wiser judgment and a stronger hand. Madame de Beaumont toek no notice of her daughter's melancholy, resolving to be guided in her conduct by approaching circumstanin silence the departure of his latest bean sunk into repose, not a cloud passed over expanse of sky, not a noise was stirring u and Pauline felt a sensation of quiet, pensi choly steal over all her thoughts, harmonic with the calmness of the scene, as it lay before her, extending far away to the glow of heaven, unawakened by a sound, unruff breath of air. The window at which she sat looked town Denis, where lay the bones of many a race of who had, in turn, worn that often-contested d which to the winner had generally proved a of thorns. But her thoughts were not of them loss of early hopes, the blight of only love, w theme on which her mind brooded, like a m over the tomb of her child. The scene before -its vast extent-the dying splendour of the s the deep pureness of the evening sky-the subli of the silence-all wrought upon her mind ; nourished from her youth in his, "dear, beautiful Pauline, we have met at last."

From the moment he had spoken, Pauline resolved to believe him as immaculate as any human being ever was since the first meeting of Adam and Eve; but still she wanted him to tell her so. It was not coquetry; but she was afraid that after what she had seen, and what she had heard, she ought not to be satisfied,—common propriety, she thought, required that she should be jealous till such time as he proved to her that she had no right to be so. She turned pale, and red, and drew back her hand without reply.

De Blenan gazed on her for a moment in silent astonishment; for, young, and ardent, and strongly tinged with that romantic spirit of gallantry which Anne of Austria had introduced from Spain into the court of France, the whole enthusiasm of his heart had been turned towards Pauline de Beaumont ; and he had thought of her the more, perhaps, because forbid to think of her. Nor had the romance he had worked up in his own mind admitted a particle of the cold ceremonies of courtly etiquette ; he had loved to figure it as something apart from the world. A life with her he loved, of ardour, and passion, and sunshiny hours, unclouded by a regret, unchiled by a reserve, but all boundless confidence, and unrestrained affection : such had been the purport of his letters to Pauline de Beaumont, and such had been the colouring of her replies to him. And who is there that has not dreamed so once ? De Blenau gazed on her for a moment in silence. "Do you not speak to me; Pauline ?" said he at length. "Or is it that you do not know me ? True, true ! years work a great change at our time of life. But I had fancied-perhaps foolishly fancied-that Pauline de Beaumont would know Claude de Blenau wheresoever they met, as well as De Blenau would know her."

While he spoke, Pauline knew not well what to do with her eyes; so she turned them towards the terrace, and they fell upon Mademoiselle de Hauteford, who was walking slowly along before the palace. Less things than that have caused greater events in this world than a renewal of all Patime's doubts. Doubts did I call them 'I Before Mademoiselle de Hauteford, with all the graceful dignity for which abe was conspicuous, had taken three steps along the terrace, Pauline's doubts had become almost certainties; and turning round, with what she fancied to be great composure, she replied, "I have the pleasure of knowing you perfectly, Monsieur de Blenau; I hope you have entirely recovered from your late wounds."

RICHELIES.

"Monsieur de Blenau !-- The pleasure of knowing me!" exclaimed the count. "Good God, is this my reception ? Not three months have goue since your letters flattered me with the title of "Dear Claude.'-- My wounds are better, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, but you seem inclined to inflict others of a more painful nature."

Pauline strove to be composed, and strove to reply, but it was all in vain; Nature would have way, and she burst into tears and sobbed aloud. "Paulline, dearest Pauline!" cried De Blenau, catching her to his bosom unrepulsed : "This must be some mistake—caim yourself, dear girl, and, in the name of Heaven, tell me, what means this conduct to one who loves you as I do!"

"One who loves me, Claude !" replied Pauline, wiping the tears from her eyes; "Oh no, no-But what right had i to think that you would love me i None, none, I will allow. Separated from each other so long, I had no title to suppose that you would ever think of the child to whom you were betrothed, but of whom you were afterward escanmanded not to entertain a remembrance were think of her, after those engagements were bridge think of her, after those engagements were bridge still, De Blemau, you should not have written letters filled with professions of Tegard, to retain the engagements your father had formed for you, notwithstanding the new obstacles which had arisen. You should not, indeed, unless you had been very sure of your own heart; for it was cruelly triling with mine," and she gently disengaged herself from his arms.—"I only blame you," whe added, "for ever trying to gain my affection, and not for now being wanting in love to a person you have never seen since she was a child." "Never seen, you " replied De Blenau, with a

"Never seen you ?" replied De Blenau, with a sin amile : " Pauline, you are as mistaken in that, as in any doubt you have of me. A year has not passed since last we met. Remember that summer sunset on the banks of the Rhone : remember the masked cavalier who gave you the ring now on your finger : remember the warm hills of Languedoc, glowing with a blush only equalled by your cheek, when he told you that that token was sent by one who loved you dearly, and would love you ever—that it came from Claude de Blenau, who had bid him place the ring on your finger, and a kiss on your hand, and renew the yow that he had long before pledged to you.—Pauline, Pauline, it was himself."

"But why, dear Claude," demanded Pauline, eagerly, forgetting coldness and pride and suspicion, in the memory of his words called up, "why did you not tell me? why did you not let me know that it was you ?"

"Because if I had been discovered," answered the count, "it might have cost me my life, years of imprisonment in the Bastille, or worse-the destruction of her I loved 7 The slightest cry of surprise from you might have betrayed me."

"But how did you escape, without your journey being known " demanded Pauline; " they say in Languedoc, that the cardinal has bribed the evil spirits of the air to be his spies on men's actions."

"It is difficult indeed to say how he acquires his information," replied De Blenau; "but, however, I passed undiscovered." It was thus it happened: 1 and gone as a volunteer to the siege of Perpignan, and I set out. For what thick you, Fauline but to visit that spot, round which all the h my heart all the dreams of my imagination hovered for many a year. But to proceed of the two first stages of my journey lowards Pi the two first stages of my journey lowards Pi suddenly changed my course, and embarking o Rhone, descended as far as the Château de B Anone, bescamed as at as we changed up to mont. You remember, that my page, Henry Mothe, is the son of your mother's jermier, old Mothe and Another an Mothe, and doubtless know full well his hot mong the caks, on the borders of the great woo t was here I took up my abode, and formed a tho nd plans of seeing you undiscovered. At lengt tune favoured me. Oh ! how my heart beat as nding by one of the trees in the long avenue and a stand as an and as an and a stand and a stand as your mother, and as, approaching towards me gradually grew more and more distinct ience almost overpowered me, tones of a voice to be remembered for many an after hour, and placing the pledge of my affection on your hand, I tore myself away."

RICHELIBU.

De Blenau paused. Insensibly, why he was speaking, Pauline had auffered his arm again to glide round her waist. Her hand somehow became clasped in his, and as he told the tale of his affection, the tears of many a mingled emotion rolled over the dar.

Il upon the lip of her pon the warm sunny wed.

tears were not tears of with him an art, he no farther; for in the whole economy of I..., more especially in that soft passion, Love, holds good the homely maxim, to let well alone. But De Bienau was not satisfied; and like a foolish youth, he teased Pauline to know why she had at first received him so coldly. In good truth, she had by this time forgotten all about it; but as she was obliged to answer, she soon again conjured up all her doubts and suspicions. She hesitated, drew her hand from that of the count, blushed deeper and deeper, and twice began to speak without ending her sentence.

"I know not what to think," said she at length, "De Blenau: I would fain believe you to be all you seem, -I would fain reject every doubt of what you say."

Her coldness, her hesitation, her embarrassment, alarmed De Blenau's fears, and he too began to be suspicious.

"On what can you rest a doubt?" demanded he, with a look of bitter mortification; and perceiving that she still paused, he added sadly, but coldly, "Mademoiselle de Beaumont, you are unkind. Can it be that you are attached to another? Say, am f so unhappy?"

"No, De Blenau, no!" replied Pauline, struggling for firmness : " but answer me one question,

106

lover, a spot wh De B

sorrow, .

4

14

1

probably wou

proposing her doubts, she felt some before convinced becaut that a thous efore convinced herself they were very before convinced norsen they were very and well founded; but all jealous suspic so very foolish in black and white, or what as good, in plain language, though they n as good, in prime tanguage, shough they a very respectable when seen through the tw passion, that Pauline knew not very well give atterance to kers. "Then tell me," sa line, with no small hesitation-" then tell me was the reason you would suffer no one to was the reason you were wounded forest-no, not even to stanch the bleeding of side ?" "There was a reason, certainly," replied do may, not very well perceiving the connexion nween his hunting-coat and Pauline's colden there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is there was a reason, certainly is the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion of the connexion of the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the connexion is the connexion of the side ?" ", " fection, whose conduct would require watching. What I know has come to my ears by mere accident. In fact," and her voice trembled the more, perhaps, that she strove to preserve its steadiness —" in fact, I have become acquainted with a painful truth through my too great kindess for you, in sending my own servant to inquire after your health, and not to watch you. Monsieur de Blena."

"Stop, stop, Pauline; in pity, stop," cried De Blenau, seeing her about to depart. "Your questions place me in the most embarrassing of situaticas. But, on my soul, I have never suffered a thought to stray from you, and yourself will one day do me justice. But at present, on this point, I am bound by every principle of duty and honour, not to attempt an exculpation,"

"None is necessary, Monsieur de Blenau," replied Pauline. "It is much better to understand each other at once. I have no right to any control over you. You are of course free, and at liberty to follow the bent of your own inclinations. Adien ! I shall always wish your welfare." And she was qutting the apartment, but De Blenau still detained her, though she gently strove to withdraw her hand.

"Yet one moment, Pauline," said he. "You were once kind, you were generous, you have more than once assured me of your affection. Now, tell me, did you bestow that affection on a man destitute of honour ? on a man who would sully his fame by pledging his faith to what was false?" Pauline's hand remained in his without an effort, and he went on. "I now pledge you my faith, and give you my honour, however strange it may appear that a lady should visit me in private. I have never loved or sought, any but yourself. Pauline, do you doubt me now !"

Her eyes were fixed upon the ground, and she did not reply, but there was a slight motion in the hand he held, as if it would fain have returned his pressure had she dared. "I could." he continued,

"within an hour, obtain permission to explain it all. But oh, Pauline, how much happier would it make me to find, that you trust alone to my word, that you put full confidence in a heart that loves you !"

"I do! I do!" exclaimed Pauline, with all her own wild energy, at the same time placing her other hand also on his, and raising her eyes to his fase : "Say no more, De Blenau. I believe I have been wrong; at all events, I cannot. I will not doubt, what makes me so happy to believe." And her eyes, which again filled with tears, were hidden on his bosom.

De Blenau pressed her to his heart, and again and again thanked the lips that had spoken such kind words, in the way that such lips may best be thanked. "Dearest Pauline," said De Blenau. after enjoying a moment or two of that peculiar happiness which shines but once or twice even in the brightest existence, giving a momentary taste of heaven, and then losing itself, either in human cares, or less vivid joys. The heart is a garden, and youth is its spring, and hope is its sunshine, and love is a thorny plant, that grows up and bears one bright flower, which has nothing like it in all the earth—

"Dearest Pauline," said De Blenau, "I leave you for a time, that I may return and satisfy every doubt. Within one hour all shall be explained."

As he spoke, the door of the apartment opened, and one of the servants of the palace entered, with a face of some alarm. "Monsieur de Blenau,"said he, "I beg a thousand pardons for intruding, but there have been, but now, at the palace gate, two men of the cardinal's guard inquiring for you : so I told them that you were most likely at the other side of the park, for-for-" and after hesitating a moment, he added, "They are the same who avrested Monsieur de Vitry."

De Blenau started, " Fly, fly, Claude " exclaimed Pauline, catching him eagerly by the arm-" Oh deal that would not have been not been necessary. In front of the Palace of St. Germain's, bu cealed from the park and terrace by an angle building, stood the Count de Chavigni, appar engaged in the very undignified occupation of ing love to a pretty-looking soubrette, no other Louise, the waiting-maid of Mademoiselle de B mont, But, notwithstanding the careless non lance with which he affected to address her, it evident that he had some deeper object in y "Well, ma belle," said he, after a few words more tender nature, "you are sure the surge aid, though the wound is in his side, his heart "Yes, exactly," said Louise, " word for word id the queen answered, . I understand you." annot think why you are so curious about it." "Because I take an interest in the young count," lied Chavigni, "But his heart must he

"None in particular," answered the other, with perfect composure—" only if you are seeking the queen, I will go with you to her majesty; and as we go, I will tell you a piece of news you may perhaps like to hear."

"Sir Count de Chavigni, I beg you would mark me, replied De Blenau. "You are one of the king's council-a gentleman of good repute, and so forth; but there is not that love between us that we should be seen taking our evening's walk together, unless, indeed, it were for the purpose of using our weapons more than our tongues."

"Indeed, Monsiear de Blenau," Tejoined Chavigni, his lip curling into a smille which partook more of good-humour than scorn, though, perhaps, mingled somewhat of each—" indeed you do not do me justice; I love you better than you know, and may have an opportunity of doing, you a good turn some day, whether you will or not. So with your leave I walk with you, for we both seek the queen."

De Blenau was provoked. "Must I tell you, sir," exclaimed he, "that your company is disagreeable to me?---that I do not like the society of men who herd with robbers and assassins?"

"Psha!" exclaimed Chavigni, somewhat peevishly. "Captious boy, you'll get yourself into the Bastille some day, where you would have been long ago, had it not been for me."

"When you tell me, sir, how such obligations have been incurred," answered the count, "I shall be happy to acknowledge them."

"Why, twenty times, Monsieur de Blenau, you arat thing you do is to quarrel with a to served you, is disposed in served you, is disposed in served you, is disposed in served you any harm served you, is disposed to serve you, service you may stand in need within utes. "But to give you proof at once that vance is more than a mere jest-Do you vance somantic avoidation to Languedo your romantic expedition to Languedou me? Monsieur de Blenau, you start, a dreamed that in such a country as this, and such an administration, any thing could tal without being known to some member of 1 ernment. No, no, sir! there are many per France, even now, who think they are ac perfect security, because no notice is appa-taken of the plane they are forming on the plane laken of the plans they are forming, or the inte they are carrying on ; while, in reality, the dred eyes of Policy are upon their every action the second is not second and their back the sword is only suspended over their heads, it may eventually fall with more severity." "You surprise me, I own," replied by showing me that you dventure, which I or only be discovered; and it is no secret to any one, nowa-days, that there are people in every situation of life, in every town of France, paid to give information of all that happens; so that the schemes must be well concealed indeed, which some circumstance does not discover. I see, you shake your head, as if you disapproved of the principle.

RICHELIES.

"De Blenau, you 'and I are engaged in different parties. You act firmly convinced of the rectitude of your own cause; do me the justice to believe that I do the same. You hate the minister—I admire him, and feel fully certain that all he does is for the good of the state. On the other hand, I appland your courage, your devotion to the cause you have espoused, and your proud unbending spirit; and I would bring you to the scaffold to-morrow, if I thought it would really serve the party to which I am attached."

The interesting nature of this conversation, and the bold candour it displayed, had made De Blenau tolerate Chavigni's society longer than he had intended; and even his dislike to the statesman had in a degree worn away before the easy dignity and frankness of his manner. But still he did not like to be seen holding any kind of companionship with one of the queen's professed enemies; and, taking advantage of the first pause, replied.

"You are frank, Monsieur de Chavigni, but my head is well where it is. And now may I ask, to what does all this tend ?"

"You need not hurry the conversation to a conclusion," replied Chavigni. "You see that we are in direct progress towards the part of the park where her majesty is most likely to be found." But seeing that De Blenau seemed impatient of such reply, he proceeded : " However, as you wish to know to what my conversation tends, I will tell you. If you please, it lends to your own good. The cardinal wishes to see you-"

He prosed, and glanced his eye over the countepance of his companion ; from which, however, he stank with him; say, do not start 1 you to betray any one's secrets, or viola honour. But be wise, set out instandly. "I suspected something of this?" Blenau, "when I heard that there were inquiring for me. But whatever I do. see the queen i' and observing that Cha about to offer some opposition, he added "It is absolutely necessary-on business ""May I ask " said Chavigni, " is it of imp to her majesty or yourself so." "I have no objection to answer that at one blast Its Blass of the Callen 13 plied De Blenan : "it concerns myself alone. "Stop a moment," cried Chavigni, Jaylo hand on the count's arm, and pausing in the m of the avenue, at the farther extremity of whit grap of three or four persons was seen appro-ing. "No business can be of more importance that on which I advise you to a Blenau, I would save you pain.

haps, in a way that may not suit the pride of your disposition. Do you see those three men that are coming down the avenue? I they are not here without an object. Come, ence more, what say you, Monsieur le Comte ? Go with me to take leave of the queen, for I must suffer no private conversation. Let us then mount our horses, and ride as friends to Paris. There pay your respects to the cardinal, and take Chavigni's word that, unless you soffer the heat of your temper to betray you into any thing unbecoming, you shall return safe to St. Germain's before to-morrow evening. If not, things must take their course."

"You offer me fair, sir," replied the count, " if I understand you rightly, that the cardinal has sent to arrest me; and of course I cannot hesitate to accept your proposal. I have no particular partiality for the Bastile, I can assure you."

"Then you consent I" said Chavigni. De Blenau bowed his head. "Well, then, I will speak to these gentlemen," he added, " and they will give us their room."

By this time the three persons, who had continged to advance down the avenue, had approached within the distance of a few paces of Chavigni and the count. Two of them were dressed in the uniform of the cardinal's guard ; one as a simple trooper, the other being the lieutenant who bore the lettre de cachet for the arrest of De Blenau. The third we have had some occasion to notice in the wood. of Mantes, being no other than the tall Norman who on that occasion was found in a rusty buff jerkin, consorting with the banditti. His appearance, howover, was now very much changed for the better. The seat trimming of his beard and mustaches, the amart turn of his broad beaver, the flush newness of his long-waisted blue silk vest, and even the hanging of his sword, which, instead of offering its hilt on the left hip, ever ready for the hand, now swung far behind, with the tip of the scabbard striking against the right calf-all denoting a change of trade the change of dress and circumstance his recollection. In the mean while Chivigni advance dinal's officer, "Monsieur Chauville," your me by preceding me to his eminence lieu. Offer him my salutation, and infor Monsieur le Comte de Blenau and mysel wait upon him this afternoon." Chanville bowed and passed on, while man, uncovering his head to Chavigni, brought back to the mind of De Blenau the stances under which he had first seen him. "You have returned, I see," said C. "Have you found an occasion of falfilling "To your heart's content, monseigneur," he Norman ; "never was such an astrologen the days of Intrin of Biois." "Hush "," said Chavighi, for the other aloud, "If you have done it, that is enough for a time keep yourself to P. court, as some one may recom-sent the sword of Monsieur de Cinq Mars out of his hand, and opened me a passage to the wood; otherwise I should have fared but badly among them."

MCHALIEU.

"You must not exact too much, Monsieur, Marteville," replied Chavigni. "Bot we will speak of this to-night. I shall be in Paris in a few hours; at present, you see, I am occupied;" and leaving the Norman, he rejoined De Blenau, and proceeded in search of the queen.

" If my memory serve me right, Monsieur de Chavigni," said De Blenau, in a tone of some bitterness, "I have seen that gentleman before, and with his sword shining at my breast."

"It is very possible," answered Chavigni, with the most indifferent calmness. "I have seen him in the same situation with repect to myself."

"Indeed !" rejoined De Blenau, with some surprise; "but probably not with the same intention," he added.

"I do not know," replied the statesman, with a smile. "His intentions in my favour were to run me through the body."

"And is it possible, then," exclaimed De Blenau, "that with such a knowledge of his character and habits, you can employ and patronise him?"

"Certainly," answered Chavigni; "I wanted a bold villais. Such men are very necessary in a state. Now, I could not have better proof that this man had the qualities required, than his attempting to cat my throat. But you do him some injustice; he is better than you suppose—is not without feeling—and has his own ideas of honour."

De Blenau checked the bitter reply which was raining to his lips, and letting the conversation drop, they proceeded in silence in search of the queen. They had not gone much farther when they perceived ber leaning familiarly on the arm of Madame de Beaumont, and seemingly occupied in some conversation of deep interest. However, her eye fell upon the count and Chavigni as they came up, and, surprised to see them together, she abruptly paused in what she was saving.

RIOH

119

"Look there, De Besumont," said she ; "something is not right. I have seen more than one of these creatures of the cardinal hanging about the park to-day." I fear for poor De Blenan. He has been too faithful to his queen to escape long."

"I salute your majesty," said Châvigni, as soon as they had come within a short distance of the queen, and not giving De Blenau the time to address her: "I have been the bearer of a mossage from his eminence of Richelieu to Monsieur de Blenau, your majesty's chamberlain, requesting the pleasure of entertaining him for a day in Paris. The count has kindly accepted the invitation ; and I have promised that the cardinal shall not press his stay beyond to-morrow. We only now want your majesty's permission and good leave, which in his eminence's name I humbly crave for Monsieur de Blenau."

"His eminence is too condescending," replied the queen. "He knows that his will is law; and we, humble kings and queens, as in dety, do him reverence. I doubt not that his intentions towards our chamberlain are as mild and anniable as his general conduct towards ourself." "The truth is, your majesty," said De Blenau, the

" The truth is, your majesty," said De Blenau, the "cardinal has sent for me, and (however Monsieur de Chavigni's politeness may colour it) in a way that compels my attendance."

"I thought so," exclaimed the queen, dropping the tone of irony which she had assumed towards Chavigni, and looking with mingled gripf and kindness upon the young cavalier, whose destruction she deemed inevitable from the moment that Richelieu had fixed the serpent eyes of his policy upon him; "I thought so. Alas, my poor De Blenau! all that attach themselves to me seem devoted to persecution."

"Not so, your majesty," said Chavigni, with some degree of feeling ; " I can assure you, pion sieur de Blenau goes at perfect liberty. He is under no arrest; and, unless he stays by his own wish, will return to your majesty's court to-morrow night. The cardinal is far from wishing to give unnecessary paia."

"Talk not to me, Sir Counsellor," replied the queen, angrily: "do I not know him? 1, who of all the world hare best cause to estimate his baseness? Have I not under his own hand the proof of his criminal ambition? but no more of that—" And breaking off into Spanish, as was frequently her custom when angry, she continued, "No se si es la misma vanidad, la sobervia, 6 la arrogancia, que todo esto, segun creo es et cardenal."

" It is useless, madam," said De Blenau, as soon as the queen paused in her angry vituperation of the minister, " to distress you farther with this conversation. I know not what the cardinal wants, but he may rest assured that De Blenau's heart is firm, and that no human means shall induce him to swerve from his duty; and thus I humbly take my leave."

"Go then, De Blenau," said the queen: "Go, and whether we ever meet again or not, your faithful services and zealous friendship shall ever have my warmest gratitude; and Anne of Austria has no other reward to bestow." Thus saying, she held out her hand to him. De Blenau in silence bent his head respectfully over it, and turned away. Chavigni bowed low, and followed the count, to whose hotel they proceeded, in order to prepare for their departure.

In the orders which De Blenau gave on their arrival, he merely commanded the attendance of his page.

"Pardon me, Monsieur de Blenau, if I observe upon your arrangements," said Chavigni, when he heard this order. "But let me remind you, once more, that you are not going to a prison, and that it might be better if your general train attended You, as a gentleman of high station about to visik

RICHELIES.

CHAPTER X.

Shows how the Count de Blenau supped in a place that he little expected.

THOUGH the attendants of the Count de Blenau did not expand much time in preparing to accompany their master, the evening was nevertheless too far spent, before they could proceed, to permit the hope of reaching Paris ere the night should have set in. It was still quite light enough, however, to show all the preparations for the count's departure to the boys of St. Germain's, who had not beheld for many a good dsy such a gay cavalcade enliven the streets of that almost deserted town.

Chavigni and De Blenau mounted their horses together; and the four or five servants which the statesman had brought with him from Paris, mingling with those of De Blenau, followed the two gentlemen as they rode from the gate. Having the privilege of the park, Chavigni took his way immediately under the windows of the palace, thereby avoiding a considerable circuit, which would have occupied more time than they could well spare at that late hour of the evening.

The moment Pauline de Beaumont had seen her lover depart, the tears, which she had struggled to repress in his presence, flowed rapidly down her cheeks. The noble, candid manner of De Blenau had nearly quelled all suspicion in her mind. The graces of his person, the tone of his voice, the glance of his eye, had realized the day-dreams which she had nourished from her youth.

Fame had long before told her that he was brave, high-spirited, chivalrous; and his picture, as well as memory, had shown him as strikingly handsome;

length they had met, and whether it truth, or whether she imagined it, matte every bright dream of her fancy seemed De Blenau; and now that she had cause his safety, she upbraided herself for having tained a suspicion. She wept then-but her tears were fro different cause to that which had occasion to flow before. However, her eyes were s when a servant entered to inform her t queen desired her society with the other h her scanty court. Pauline endeavoured to the marks which her weeping had left, and obeyed the summons, which being usual hour, she knew was on no business of import on entering the closet, she perceived that ten The circle which consisted of Madame de l mont, Mademoiselle de Hauteford, and an adv of honour, had drawn round the windd open, admitted the breeze

Pauline approached the window, and took her station by the side of the queen, who, rising from her seat, placed her arm kindly through that of Mademoiselle de Beaumont, and leaning gently upon her, prevented the possibility of her retiring from the spot where she stood.

In the meanwhile the cavalcade approached. The gay trappings of the horses, and the rich suits of their riders, with their silk scarfs and swordknots of blue and gold, soon showed to the keen ayes of the queen's ladies that the young Count de Blenau was one of the party; while every now and then a horseman in isabel and silver appearing among the rest, told them, to their no small surprise, that he was accompanied by the Count de Chavigni, the sworn friend of Richelieu, and one of the principal leaders of the cardinal's party. The queen, however, evinced no astonishment, and her attendants of course did not attempt to express the wonder they felt at such a companionship.

The rapid pace at which the two gentlemen proceeded soon brought them near the palace; and chavigni, from whose observant eye nothing passed without notice, instantly perceived the queen and her party at the window, and marked his salutation with a profound inclination, low almost to servility, while De Blenau raised his high-plumed hat and bowed, with the dignity of one conscious that he had deserved well of all who saw him.

Chavigni led the way to Marly, and thence to Ruel, where night began to come heavily upon the twilight; and long before they entered Paris, all objects were lost in darkness. "You must be my guest for to-night, Monsieur de Blenau, said Chavigni, as they rode on down the Rue St. Honoré, "for it will be too late to visit the cardinal this evening."

However, as they passed the Palais Royal, the blaze of light, which proceeded from every window of the edifice, told that on that night the superb minister entertained the court; --a court, of which he had deprived his king, and which he had appropriated to himself. De Blenau drew a deep sigh as he gazed upon the magnificent edifice, and compared the pomp and luxury which every thing appertaining to it displayed, with the silent, desolate melancholy which reigned in the royal palaces of France.

Passing on down the Rue St. Honoré, and crossing the Rue St. Martin, they soon reached the Place Royale, in which Chavigni had fixed his residence. Two of De Blenau's servants immediately placed themselves at the head of his horse, and held the bridle short, while Henry de La Mothe sprang to the stirrup. But at that moment a gentleman who seemed to have been waiting the arrival of the travellers, issued from the Hotel de Bouthiliers, and prevented them from dismounting.

⁷⁴ Do not alight, gentlemen." exclaimed he ; " his eminence the Cardinal de Richelieu has sent me to request that Messieurs de Bleau and Chavigni will partake a small collation at the Palais Cardinal, without the ceremony of changing their dress."

De Blenau would fain have excused himself, alleging that the habit which he wore was but suited to the morning, and also was soiled with the dust of their long ride. But the cardinal's officer overbore all opposition, declaring that his eminence would regard it as a higher compliment, if the count would refrain from setting foot to the ground till he entered the grates of his palace.

"Then we must go back," said Chavigni. "We are honoured by the cardinal's invitation. Monsieur de Blenau, pardon me for having brought you so far wrong. Go in, Chatenay," he added, turning to one of his own domestics, "and order flambeaux."

In a few moments all was ready; and preceded by half a dozen-torch-bearers on foot, they once more turned towards the dwelling of the minister. As they did so, De Blenau's feelings were not of the most agreeable nature, but he acquiesced in silence, for to have refused his presence would have been worse than useless.

RICHELLEU.

The Palais Royal, which, as we have said, was then called the Palais Cardinal, was a very different building when occupied by the haughty minister of Louis the Thirteenth, from that which we have seen it in our days. The unbounded resources within his power gave to Richelieu the means of lavishing on the mansion which he erected for himself, all that art could produce of elegant, and all that wealth could supply of magnificence. For seven years the famous Le Mercier laboured to perfect it as a building; and during his long administration, the cardinal himself never ceased to decorate it with every thing rare or luxurious. The large space which it occupied was divided into an outer and an inner court, round which, on every side, the superb range of buildings, forming the palace. was placed in exact and beautiful proportion, presenting every way an external and internal front. decorated with all the splendour of architectural ornament.

The principal façade lay tawards the Rue St. Honoré, and another of simpler, but perhaps more correct design, towards the gardens, which last were themselves one of the wonders of Paris at the time. Extending over the space now occupied by the Rue de Bichelieu, the Rue de Valois, and several other streets, they contained, within themselves, many acres of ground, and were filled with every plant and flower that Europe then possessed, scattered about among the trees, which, being planted long before the formality of the Dutch taste was introduced in France, had in general been allowed to fall into natural groups, unperverted into the long avenues and straight alleys which disfigure so many of the royal parks and gardens on the Coalinent.

The right wing of the first court was principally occupied by that beautiful theatre, so atrongly connected with every classic remembrance of the French stage, in which the first tragedies of Rotrou and Corneille were produced,-in which many of the inimitable comedies of Moliere were first given to the world, and in which he himself acted till his death.

In the wing immediately opposite was the chapel, built in the lonic order, and ornamented in that pure and simple manner which none knew better how to value than the Cardinal de Richelieu.

The two courts were divided from each other by a massive pile of building, containing the grand saloon, the audience-chamber, and the cabinet of the high council. On the ground floor was the banqueting-room and its ante-chamber; and a great part of the building fronting the gardens was occupied by the famous gallery of portraits, which Richelieu had taken care should comprise the best pictures that could be procured of all the greatest characters in French history.

The rest of the palace was filled with various suites of apartments, generally decorated and furnished in the most sumptuous manuer. Great part of these the cardinal reserved either for public entertainments, or for his own private use; but what remained was nevertheless fully large enough to contain that host of officers and attendants by which he was usually surrounded.

On the evening in question almost every part of that immense building was thrown open to receive the multitude that interest and fear gathered round the powerful and vindictive minister. Almost all that was gay, almost all that was beautiful, had been assembled there. All to whom wealth gave something to secure-all to whom rank gave something to maintain-all whom wit rendered anxious for distiction-all whom talent prompted to ambition. Equally those that Richelieu feared or loved, hated or admired, were brought there by some means, and for some reason. The scene which met the eye of Do Blenan and Chavigni, as they ascended the grand staiacase and entered the saloon, can only be qualified by the word princely. The blaze of jewels, the glare of innumerable lights, the splendid dresses of the guests, and the magnificent decorations of the apartments themselves, all harmonized together, and formed a coup-d'oeil of surpassing brilliancy.

The rooms were full, but not crowded; for there were attendants stationed in various parts for the purpose of requesting the visiters to proceed, whenever they observed too many collected in one spot. Yet care was taken that those who were thus treated with scant ceremony should be of the inferior class admitted to the cardinal's fete. Each officer of the minister's household was well instructed to know the just value of every guest, and how far he was to be courted, either for his mind or influence.

To render to all the highest respect, was the general order, but some were to be distinguished. Care was also taken that none should be neglected, and an infinite number of servants were seen gliding through the apartments, offering the most costly and delicate refreshments to every individual of the mixed assembly.

De Blenau followed Chavigni through the grand saloon, where many an eye was turned upon the elegant and manly figure of him, who on that night of splendour and finery, presumed to show himself in a suit, rich indeed and well-fashioned, but evidently intended more for the sports of the morning than for the gay evening circle in which he then stood. Yet it was remarked, that none of the ladies drow back as the cavalier passed them, notwithstanding his riding-dress and his dusty boots; and one fair demoiselle, whose rank would have sanctioned it, had it been done on purpose, was unfortunate enough to entangle her train on his spurs. The Count de Coligni stepped forward to disengage it, but De Blenau himself had already bent one knee to the ground, and easily freeing the spur from the robe of Mademoiselle de Bourbon, he remained for a moment in the same attitude. "It is but just," said he, "that I should kneel, at once to repair my awkwardness, and sue for pardon."

"It was my sister's own fault, De Blenau," said the Duke d'Enghien, approaching them, and embracing the young count. "We have not met, dear friend, since the rendering of Perpignan. But what makes you here ? Does your proud spirit bend at last to ask a grace of My Lord Uncle Cardinal ?" "No, your highness," replied De Blenau; "no

"No, your highness," replied De Blenau; "no farther grace have I to ask, than leave to return to St. Germain's as soon as I may."

"What!" said the duke, in the abrupt heedless manner in which he always spoke, "does he threaten you too with that cursed bugbear of a Bastille ? a bugbear, that makes one man fly his country, and another betray it; that makes one man run his sword into his heart, and another marry;"--alluding without ceremony to his own compelled espousal of the cardinal's niece. "But there stands Chavigni," he continued, "waiting tor you, I suppose. Go on, go on; there is no stopping when once you have got within the cardinal's magic circle-Go on, and God speed your suit; for the sooner you are out of that same circle the better."

Quitting the young hero, who had already, on more than one occasion, displayed that valor and conduct which in after-years procured for him the immortal name of the Great Coude, the Count de Blenau passed another group, consisting of the beautiful Madame de Montbazon and her avowed lover, the Duke of Longueville, who soon after, notwithstanding his unconcealed passion for another, became the husband of Mademoiselle de Bourbon. For be it remarked, in those days a bitter quarrel existed between Love and Marriage, and they were seldom seen together in the same society. It is said indeed, that in France, a coolness remains be tween them to this day. Here also was the Duke of Guise, who afterward played so conspicuous VOL: L 0 part in the revolution of Naples, and by his singular adventures, his gallantry and chivalrous courage acquired the name of UHero de la Fable, as Conde had been called UHero de la Histoire. Still passing on, De Blenan rejoined Chavigni, who waited for him at the entrance of the next chamber.

It was the great hall of audience, and at the farther extremity stood the Cardinal de Richelieu hintself, leaning for support against a gilt railing, which defended from any injurious touch the beautiful picture of Raphael, so well known by the title of "La Belle Jardiniere." He was dressed in the long purple robes of his order, and wore the peculiar hat of a cardinal; the bright color of which made the deadly hue of his complexion look still more ghastly. But the paleness of his countenance, and a certain attenuation of feature, was all that could be discerned of the illness from which he suffered. The powerful mind within seemed to conquer the feebleness of the body. His form was erect and dignified. his eye beaming with that piercing sagacity and haughty confidence in his own powers, which so distinguished his policy ; and his voice clear, deep. and firm, but of that peculiar quality of sound, that it seemed to spread all round, and to come no one knew from whence, like the wind echoing through

It was long since De Blennu had, seen the cardinal; and on entering the audience-chamber, the sound of that voice made him start. Its clear hollow tone seemed close to him, though Richelieu was conversing with some of his immediate friends at the further end of the room.

As the two cavaliers advanced, De Blenau had an opportunity of observing the manner in which, the minimizer treated those around him : but far from telling aught of dangeons and of death, his conversation seemed cheerful, and his demeanor mild and placid. "And can this be the man," thought the count, "the fabric of whose power is concented or blood and torure ?"

They had now approached within a few paces of the spot where the cardinal stood; and the figure of Chavigni catching his eye, he advanced a step, and received him with unaffected kindness. Towards De Blenau, his manner was full of elegant politeness. He did not embrace him as he had done Chavigni; but he held him by the hand for a moment, gazing on him with a dignified approving smile. Those who did not well know the heart of the subtle minister, would have called that smile benevolent, especially when it was accompanied by many kind inquiries respecting the young nobleman's views and pursuits. De Blenau had been taught to judge by actions, not professions ; and the cardinal had taken care to imprint his deeds too dceply in the minds of men to be wiped out with soft words. To dissemble was not De Blenau's forte; and yet he knew, that to show a deceiver he cannot deceive, is to make him an open enemy for ever. He replied, therefore, calmly and politely ; neither repulsed the cardinal's advances, nor courted his regard; and after a few more moments of desultory conversation, prepared to pursue his way through the various apartments.

"There are some men, Monsieur le Comte," said the cardinal, seeing him about to pass on, "whom I might have scrupled to invite to such a scene as this, in their riding-dress. But the Count de Blenau is not to be mistaken."

"I felt no scruple," answered De Blenau, "in presenting myself thus, when your eminence desired it; for the dress in which the Cardinal de Richelien, thought fit to receive me, could not be objected to by any of his circle."

The cardinal bowed; and De Blenau adding, that he would not intrude farther at that moment, that his way through the suite of apartments to Richelieu's left hand. Chavigni was about to follow but a sign from the cardinal stopped him, and young count passed on alone. Each of the various rooms he entered was the ed with it own peculiar groups. In one, was an assembly of famous artists and sculptors; in another, a close convocation of philosophers, discussing a thousand absurd theories of the day; and in the last he came to, was a buzzing hive of poets and beaux esprits; each trying to distinguish himself, each jealous of the other, and all equally vain and full of themselves.

In one corner was Scuderi, haranguing npon the nature of tragedy, of which he knew nothing. In another place, Voiture, throwing off little empty coup-lets and bon-mots, like a child blowing bubbles from a tobacco-pipe; and farther on was Rotron, surrounded by a select party more silent than the rest, to whom he recited some of his unpublished poems, marking strongly the verse, and laying great emphasis upon the rhyme. De Blenau stopped for a moment to listen while the poet proceeded :--

> " L'anke desin se leve, et le mignard Zephire, Partumant l'horizon du doux air qu'il sephire, Ya d'un son agrerble esceiller les oiseaux Pour miser le jour qui parois sur les eaux."

But though the verses he recited were highly poetic, the extravagant affectation of his manuer soon nentralized their effect upon De Blenau; and passing on down a broad flight of steps, De Blenau found himself in the gardens of the palace. These, as well as the whole front of the building, were illuminated in every direction. Banda of musicians were dispersed in the different walks, and a multitude of servants were bissily engaged in laying out tables for supper with all the choicest vinnds of the season, and in trimming the various lamps and lapers which hung from the branches of the trees, or were displayed on fanciful frames of wood, so placed as to give the fullest light to the banquests which were situated near them.

Scattered about in various parts of the gardon, but more especially near the palace, were different groups of gentlemen, all speaking of plays, assemblies, or fêtes, and all taking care to make their conversation perfectly audible, lest the jealous suspicion ever attendant on usurped power, should attribute to them schemes which, it is probable, fear alone prevented them from attempting.

Nevertheless, the gardens, as we have said, containing several acres of ground, there were many parts comparatively deserted. It was towards these more secluded spots that De Blenau directed his steps, wishing himself many a league away from the Palais Cardinal and all its splendor. Just as he had reached a part where few persons were to be seen, some one struck him slightly on the arm, and turning round, he perceived a man who concealed the lower part of his face with his cloak, and tendered him what seemed to be a billet.

At the first glance De Blenau thought he recognised the Count de Coligni, a reputed lover of Mademoiselle De Bourbon, and imagined that the little piece of gallantry he had shown that lady on his first entrance, might have called upon him the wrath of the jealous Coligni. But no sconer had he taken the piece of paper, than the other darled away among the trees, giving him no time to observe more, either of his person or his dress.

Approaching a spot where the number of lamps gave him sufficient light to read, De Blenau opened the note, which contained merely these words: "Beware of Chavigni;—they will seek to draw something from you which may criminate you hereafter."

As he read, De Blenau heard a light step advancing, and hastily concealing the note, turned to see who approached. The only person near was a lady, who had thrown a thick veil over her head, which not only covered her face, but the upper part of her figure. She passed close by him, but without turning her head, or by any other motion seeming to no lice him; but as she did so, De Blenau heard a to wice from under the veil, desiring him to follow Gliding on, without pausing for a moment, the lady led the way to the very extreme of the garden. De Blenau followed quick upon her steps, and as he did so, eudeavored to call to mind where he had seen that graceful and dignified figure before. At length the lady stopped, looked round for a moment, and raising her yeil, discovered the lovely countenance of Mademoiselle de Bourbon.

"Monsieur de Blennu," said the princess, "I have but one moment to tell you, that the cardinal and Chavigni are ploting the rain of the queen; and they winh to force or persuade you to betray her. After you had left the cardinal, by chance I heard it proposed to arrest you even to night; but Chavigni said, that he had given his word that you should return to St. Germain's to-morrow. Take care, therefore, of your conduct while here, and if you have any cause to fear, escape the moment you and at liberty. Fly to Flandera, and place yourself ander the protection of Dop Francisco de Mello."

"I have to return your highness a thousand thanks," replied De Blenau; "but as far as innoconce can give security, I have no reason to fear."

"Innocence is nothing here," rejoined the lady, "But you are the best judge, Monsieur de Blenau. I sent Coligni to warn you, and taking an opportunity of escaping from the supper-table, came to request that you will offer my humble duty to the queen, and assure her that Marie de Bourbon is ever hors. But here is some one coming-Good God, it is Chavigni!"

As she spoke, Chavigni came rapidly upon them. Mademoiselle de Bourbon drew down her voll, and De Blenau placed himself between her and the statesman, who, affecting an escess of gayety, totally foreign to his natural character, begen to rally the count upon what he termed his gallantry. "So, Monsieur de Blennu," cried he, "siready paying your devoirs to our Parisian dames. Nay, 1 must offer my compliments to your fair lady on her 508-quest ;" and he endeavored to pass the count towards Mademoiselle de Bourbon,"

135

De Blenau drew his sword. "Stand off, sir," exclaimed he, "or by Heaven you are a dead man !" And the point came flashing so near Chavigni's brenst, that he was fain to start back a step or two. The tady seized the opportunity to pass him, for the palinade of the garden inde prevented her sacaping the other way. Chavigni attempted to follow, but De Blenau caught his arm, and held him with a grasp of iron.

"""""""""" "" cried he. "" Monsieur de Chavigni, you huve strangely forgot yourself. How is it you presume, sir, to interrupt my convensation with any one?" And let me ask, what affair is it of yours, if a lady chose to give me five minutes of her company even here! You have slackened your gallantry not a little."

"But was the cardinal's garden a place fitted for such love stories I" demanded Chavigni, feeling at the same time very sure that the conversation he had interrupted had not been of love; for in those days politics and faction divided the heart of a Frenchwoman with gallantry, and, instead of quarrelling for the empire of her breast, these apparently opposite passions went hand in hand together ; and exempt from the more serious dangers incurred by the other ser in similar cuterprises, women were often the most active agents and zealous partisans in the factions and conspiracies of the times.

It had been Chavigni's determination, on accompanying De Blemau to the Pahis Cardinal, not to love sight of his companion for a moment, in order that no communication might take place between him and my of the queen's party till such time as the cardinal had personally interrogated him concerning the correspondence which they supposed that have of Austria carried on with her butter, Philip of Spain. Chavigni, however, had been stopped, we we have seen, by the cardinal binself, and detain for some time in conversation, the principal object of which was, the Count de Blenau himself, and the means of either persuading him by favor, or of driving him by fear, not only to abandon, but to betray the party he had espoused. The cardinal thought ambition would do all; Chavigni said that it would not move De Blenau: and thus the discussion was considerably prolonged.

RICHELLEU.

As soon as Chavigni could liberate himself, he had hastened after the count, and found him as we have described. To have ascertained who was his companion, Chavigni would have risked his life; but now that she had escaped him, the matter was past recall; and willing again to throw De Blenau off his guard, he made some excuses for his intrusion, saying he had thought that the lady was not unknown to him.

"Well, well, let it drop," replied De Blenau fully more desirous of avoiding farther inquiries than Chavigni was of relinquishing them. "But the next time you come across me on such an occasion, beware of your heart's blood, Monsieur de Chavigni." And thus saying, he thrust back his sword into the scabbard.

Chavigni, however, was resolved not to lose sight of him again, and passing his arm through that of the count, "You are still too hot, Monsieur de Blenau," said he; "but nevertheless let us be friends again."

"" As far as we ever were friends, sir," replied De Blenau, "The open difference of our principles in every respect, must always prevent our greatly assimilating."

Chavigui, however, kept to his purpose, and did not withdraw his arm from that of De Blenau, nor quit bim again during the whole evening.

Whether the statesman suspected Mademoiselle de Bourbon or not, matters little; but on entering the banquet-room, where the principal guests were preparing to take their seats, they passed that lady with her brother and the Count de Coligni, and the eye of Chavigni glanced from the countenance of De Blenau to hers. But they were both upon their guard, and not a look betrayed that they had met since De Blenau's spur had been entangled in her train.

At that moment the master of the ceremonies exclaimed with a load voice, "Place au Comte de Blenau," and was conducting him to a seat higher than his rank entitled him to take, when his eye fell upon the old Marquis de Brion; and with the deference due not only to his station, but to his high military renown, De Blenau drew back to give him precedence.

"Go on, go on. mon cher de Blenau," said the old soldier; and lowering his voice to a whisper, he added, "honest men like you and I are all out of place here; so go on, and never mind. If it were in the field, we would strive which should be first; but here there is no knowing which end of the table is most honorable."

"Wherever it were, I should always be happy to follow Monsieur de Brion," replied De Blenau; "but as you will have it, so let it be." And following the master of the ceremonies, he was soon placed among the most distinguished guests, and within four or five seats of the cardinal. Like the spot before a heathen altar, it was always the place either of honor or sacrifice; and De Blenau scarcely knew which was to be his fate. At all events, the distinction which he met with was by no means pleasing to him, and he remained in silence during greater part of the banquet.

Every thing in the vast hall where they sat was magnificent beyond description. It was like one of those scenes in fairy romance, where supernatural powers lend their aid to dignify some human festival. All the apartment was as fully illuminated if the broad sun had shone into it in his follsplendor; yet not a single light was to be a Soft sounds of music also occasionally through the air, but never so loud as to interrupt the conversation.

At the table all was glitter, and splendor, and luxury; and from the higher end at which De Blenau sat, the long perspective of the hal', decked out with all a mighty kingdom's wealth, and crowded with the gay, the bright, and the fair, offered an interminable view of beauty and magnificence.

I might describe the passing of the banquet, and the bright smiles that were given, and the bright things that were said. I might enlarge upon the crowd of domestics, the activity of the seleschals and officers, and tell of the splendor of the decorations. I might even introduce the famous court fool, L'Angeli, who stood behind the chair of his young lord the Duke d'Eughien. But no-armster's hand has given to the world so many splendid pictures of such scenes, that mine would seem but a feeble imitation. Let such things rest with Scott, whose magic wand has had power to call up the epirit of the past with as much truth as if it were fagin substantially in being.

To pursue our theme, however. 'The Cardinal de Richelieu, who held in his hand the fate of all who sat around him, yielding to his guests the most marked attention, treating them with the profound humility of great pride; trying to quell the fire of his eye, till it should become nothing but affability ; and to soften the deep tones of his voice, from the accent of command to an expression of gentle courteny; but notwithstanding all his efforts, a degree of that haughtiness with which the long habit of despotic rule had tinged his manners, would occusionally appear, and still show that it was the lord entortaining his vassals. His demeanor towards De Blenan, however, was all suavity and kindness. He addressed him several times is the most marked manner during the course of the banquet, and listened to his reply with one of those approving smiles, so sweet upon the lips of power. De Blenag was not to be deceived, it is true. Yet.

RIGHELIEU.

though he knew that kindness to be assumed on p Bose to befray, and the smile to be as false as he there was a fascination in the distinction shown hil against which he could not wholly guard his hea His brow unbent of its frown, and he entered in the gay conversation which was going on around but at that moment he observed the cardin glance his eye towards Chavigni with a meaning

De Blenau marked it. "So," thought he, " my Lord Cardinal, you deem me your own." And as the guests rose, De Blenau took his leave, and returned with Chavigni to the Place Royale.

CHAPTER XI.

Containing a Conference, which ends much as it began. THE music of the cardinal's fete rang in De Blenau's cars all night, and the lights danced in his eyes, and the various guests fitted before his imagination, like the figures in some great phantasintgoria. One time he seemed wandering in the gar-dens with Pauline de Beaumont, and offering up all the dearest treasures of his heart, when suddenly the lady raised her yell, and it was Mademoiselle de Bourbon. Then again he was sealed on the cardinal's right hand, who poured out for him a cap of wine : he mised it to his lips, and was about to drink, when some one dashed it from his hand, etc. claiming, if is puson if then turning round to see who had thus interposed, he belield a figure without a head, and the overthrown cup poured forth a stream of blood. The next moment it was all the cardinal's funeral, and the fool if Angeli appeared.

mer the heat of your any thing unbecoming, yo Germain's before to-morro must take their course." "You offer me lair, sir," understand you rightly, that arrest me; and of course cept your proposal. I have for the Bastile, I can assure " Then you consent ?" ea bowed his head. "Well, th gentlemen," he added, "an room." By this time the three p ed to advance down the within the distance of a fer he count. Two of them irm of the cardinal's guard , the other being the lies de cachet for the arrest have had some occasie dantes, being no other il hat occasion was found orting with the banditt was now very much oat trimming of his h turn of his broad beau s-waisted blue silk v his sword, which, in oft hip, ever ready f d, with the tip of right calf-all de the approach of morning, the uneasy visions died away, and left him in deep sleep, from which he rose refreshed, and prepared to encounter the events of a new day.

Alas! that man should still rise to sorrow and to danger, and that the kindest gift of Heaven should be the temporary forgetfulness of existence. Sorrow! how is it that thy coarse thread is so intimately mingled with the web of life, that he who would tear thee out must rend the whole fabric 7 Oh life, thou long sad dream! when shall we rise from all thy phantom agenies to that bright waking which we fondly hope f

De Blenau prepared his mind, as a man arming for a battle; and sent to notify to Chavigni, that he was about to visit the cardinal. In a few minutes after, the statesman himself appeared, and courteously conducted the young count to his horse, but did not offer to accompany him to the minister. "Monsieur de Blenau," said he, "it is better you should go alone. After your audience, you will doubtless be in haste to return to St. Germain's; but if you will remain to take your noon meal at my poor table, I shall esteem myself honored."

De Blenau thanked him for his courtesy, but declined, stating that he was anxious to return home before night, if he were permitted to do so at all. "My word is passed for your safety," replied Chavigat; "so have no doubt on that head. But take my counsel, Monsieur le Comte: moderate your proud bearing towards the cardinal. Those who play with a lion, must take good care not to irritate him."

On arriving at the Palais Cardinal, De Blenau left his attendants in the outer court, and following an officer of the household, proceeded through a long suite of apartments to a large saloon, where he found several others waiting the leisure of the minister, who was at that moment engaged in conference with the ambassador from Sweden.

De Blenau's own feelings were not of the most and down his own corner with irregul downcast looks. Another leaned back with his chin resting on his breast, and tently a door in the other side of the s another sat bending his hat into so m that he left it, in the end, of no shape a all were marked by the knitted prow a eye, for men whose fate was hanging on of another. There was nothing consolatory in their l De Blenau trade to the portraits which the walls of the saloen. The first that his upon was that of the famous Montmorein was represented as armed in steel, with 1 uncovered; and from his apparent age it that the picture had not been platent agents the unfortunate compiracy, which, by its brought him to the scaffold. There was also pression of grave sadness in the countenance he had presiged his approaching fate turned to another; but it so have ture in the room whom Rie pense ; for, in a few minutes, the door on the other side of the room opened, and the Swedish ambassador passed out. The door shut behind him, but in a moment after an attendant entered, and although several others had been waiting before him, De. Blenau was the first summoned to the presence of the cardinal.

He could not help feeling as if he wronged those he left still in doubt as to their fate : but following the officer through an ante-room, he entered the audience closet, and immediately perceived Richelieu seated at a table, over which were strewed a multitude of papers of different dimensions, some of which he was busily engaged in examining ;—reading them he was not, for his eye glanced so rapidly over their contents, that his knowledge of each could be but general. He paused for a moment as De Blenau entered, bowed his head, pointed to a done, he signed the papers, and gave them to a dulllooking personage, in a black silk pourpoint, who stood behind his chair.

"Take these three death-warrants," said he, "to Monsieur Lafemas, and then these others to Poterie at the Bastille. But no stop," he continued, after a moment's thought; "you had better go to the Bastille first, for Poterie can put Caply to the torture, while you are gone to Lafemas; and you can bring me back his confession as you return."

De Blenau shuddered at the sand froid with which the minister commanded those timgs that, make one's blood curdle even to imagine. But the attendant was practised in such commissions; and taking the packets, as a mere matter of course, he howed in silence, and disappearing by a door on the other side, left De Blenau alone with the cardinal.

"Well, Monsieur de Blenau," said Richelieu, looking up with a frank smile, "your pardon, for having detained you. There are many things, upon which I have long wished to speak to you, and this

I feel my bosom to be clea own part. Blenau. "I doubt it not, Monsieur le Comte," minister, with a gracious inclination of "I doubt it not; I know your spirit to be and noble to mingle in petty faction and tre entral. No one more admires your brave a pendent bearing than myself. You must re that I have marked you from your youth. been educated, as it wore, under my own ev were it how necessary to trust the welfare state to the honor of any one man, I would c it to the honor of De Blenan". "To what, in the name of Heaven, can this le it to the hopor of De Blenau." thought De Blengu ; but he bowed without ; and the cardinal proceeded. "I have, for some time past," he continu "been thinking of placing you in one of those h stations, to which your rank and consideration tle you to aspire. At present, none are as a fore-runner to such advas call you to the council this by my individual regard; but the truth is, that the state requires, at this moment, the services of one, who joins to high talents a thorough knowledge of the affairs of Spain."

"So?" thought De Blenau, "I have it now. The government of Poitou, and a seat at the council, provided I betray the queen and sell my own honor." Richelieu seemed to wait an answer, and De Blenau replied : "If your eminence means to attribute such knowledge to me, some one must have greatly misled you. I possess no information on the affairs of Spain whatever, except from the common reports and journals of the time."

This reply did not seem to affect Richelieu's intentions. "Well, well, Monsieur de Blenau," said he, with a smile, " you will take your seat at the council, and will, of course, as a good subject and an honorable man, communicate to us whatever information you possess on those points which concera the good of the state. We do not expect all at once ; and every thing shall be done to smooth your way, and facilitate your views. Then, perhaps, if Richelieu live to execute the plans he has formed, you, Monsieur de Blenau, following his path, and sharing his confidence, may be ready to take his place when death shall at length call him from it."

The cardinal counted somewhat too much on De Blenau's ambition, and not sufficiently on his knowledge of the world; and imagining that he had, the evening before, discovered the weak point in the character of the young count, he thought to lead him to any thing by holding out to him extravagant prospects of future greatness. The dish, however, was somewhat too highly flavored; and De Blenau replied, with a smile,---

"Your eminence is exceedingly good to think at all of me, in the vast and more important projects which occupy your mind. But, alas! my lord, De Blenau would prove but a poor successor to Richelieu. No, my lord cardinal," he continued, "I have

• De Bienan was piqued, and lost personal dauger, my lord, I am never ed he. " But when along with risk to volved danger to my friends, danger to danger to my honer, and danger to m heretarside the cardinal's glance full a it had been gives; " thea, my lord cardi say, it ware no cowardice, but true co from such peril—unless," he added, re the folly of opposing the irritable and un minister, and thinking that his words hau been already too warm—" unless, indeed within ene's breast the mind of Richelieu

.

While De Bleaau spoke, the cardinal's b ted into a frows. A finsh too came over h and untying the ribband which served as a he took off the velves care he generally w to size Almost air. Ble heard thin, howev end, and then answered dryly, "You sp Moussieur the Blenau, and, I doubt not say. Bat am I to under therefore still less could I yield you any advice. Your eminence would be wofully disappointed, when you expected to find a man well acquainted with the arts of government, and deep read in the designs of foreign states, to meet with one whose best knowledge is to range a battalion or to pierce a boar; a soldier, and not a diplomatist; a hunter, and not a statesman. As to the government of Poitou, my lord, its only good would be the emolument, and already my revenues are far more than adequate to my wants."

"You reluse my kindness, sir," replied the cardinal, with an air of deep determined haughtiness, very different from the urbanity with which he had at first received De Blenau; "I must now speak to you in snother tone. And let me warn you to beware of what you say; for be assured, that I already possess sufficient information to confound you if you should orevaricate."

"My lord cardinal," replied De Blenau, somewhat hastily, "I am not accustomed to prevaricate. Ask any questions you please, and, so long as my honor: and my duty go with them, I will answer you."

"Then there are questions," said the cardinal, "that you would think against your duty to anawer!"

"I said not so, your eminence," replied De Blenau. " In the examination I find I am to undergo, give my words their full meaning, if you please, but no more than their meaning."

"Well then, sir, answer me as a man of honor and a French noble," said the cardinal; " Are you not aware of a correspondence that has been, and is now, carried on between Anne of Austria and Don Froncisco de Mello, governor of the Low Countries ?"

"I know not whom you mean, sir, by Anne of Austria," replied De Blenau. "If it be her majesty, your queen and mine, that you so designate, I reply at once that I know of no such correspondence, nor do I believe that it exists.⁷²

"Do you mean to say, Monsieur de Blenau," demanded the cardinal, fixing his keen sunken syes upon the young count with that basilisk glance for which he was famous—"Do you mean to say that you yourself have not forwarded letters from the queen to Madame de Chevreuse and Don Francisco de Mello by a private channel ? Pause, Monsieur de Blenau, before you answer, and be well assured that I am acquainted with every particular of your conduct."

"Your eminence is, no doubt, acquainted with much more intricate subjects than any of my actions," replied the count. "With regard to Madame de Chevreuso, her majesty has no need to conceal a correspondence with her, which has been fully permitted and sanctioned both by your eminence and the still higher authority of the king; and I may add, that to my certain knowledge, letters have gone to that lady by your own courier. On the other point, I have answered already; and have only to say once more, that I know of no such correspondence, nor world I, assuredly, lend myself to any such measures, which I should conceive to be treasonable."

"I have always hitherto supposted you to be a man of honor," said the cardinal, coolly ; "but what must I conceive now, Monsieur le Comte, when I tell you that I have those very letters in my possession ?"

"You may conceive what you please, sir," replied De Blenau, giving way to his indignation ; "but I will dare any man to lay before me a letter from her majesty to the person you mention, which has passed through the hands of Da Blenau."

The cardinal did not reply: opening an ebony cabinet which stood on his right-hand, he took from one of the compartments a small bundle of paper. From which he selected one, and laid it on the ble befors the count, who had bitherto look with no small wonder and expectation. "Down who was a still keeping his hand upon the paper, in s such manner as to allow only a word or two to be visible.

RICHELIES_

De Blenau examined the line which the cardinal suffered to appear, and replied—" From what little 1 can see, I should imagine it to be the handwriting of her majesty. But that does not show that I have any thing to do with it."

"But there is that in it which does," answered Richelieu, folding down a line or two of the letter, and pointing out to the count a sentence which said, "This will be conveyed to you by the Count de Blenau, who, you know, never fails."

"Now, sir ¹² continued the cardinal, "once more let me advise you to give me all you possess upon this subject. From a feeling a personal regard, 1 have had too much patience with you already."

"All 1 can reply to your eminence," answered the count, not a little embarrassed, " is, that no letter whatever has been conveyed by me, knowingly, to the governor of the Low Countries."

De Blennu's eyes naturally fixed on the paper, which still lay on the table, and from which the cardinal had by this time withdrawn his hand; and feeling that both life and honor depended upon that document, he resolved to ascertain its authenticity, of which he entertained some doubt.

"Stop," said he, hastily, "let me look at the superscription," and before Richelieu could reply, be had raised it from the table and turned to the address. One glance was enough to satisfy him, and be returned it to the cardinal with a cool and meaning smile, repeating the words—"To Madame de Cherense."

At first the cardinal had instinctively stretched out his hand to stop De Blenau in his purpose, but he instantly recovered himself, nor did his contemined betray the least change of feeling. " Well tenau's bowing his head, and smilin ter's art; "I meant Don Francisco had answered what you said in regar de Chevreuse before." "I did mistake you then, sir," said "but it was from the ambiguity of your However, passing over your boldness in However, passing over your boldness, in letter without my permission, I will sho pect. I will tell you there expressed sage you sent to the queen, after you we drive the sensed of Mantas Annual to the sense of the ed in the wood of Mantes, conveying to you had not lost the packet with which y charged. Did not Seguin tell her, on your p though the wound was in your side, your her not injured ?" i "I dare say he did, my lord," replied De B coolly ; " and the event has proved that he was right, for your eminence most perceive that quite recovered, which, of course, could hope, your eminence, the

But no consideration shall stay me from visiting, with the full severity of the law, such as do so offend; and though the information I want be but small, depend upon it, I shall not hesitate to employ the most powerful means to wring it from you."

De Blenau had no difficulty in comprehending the nature of those means to which the cordinal alluded; but his mind was made up to soffer the worst. "My Lord Cardinal," replied he, "what your intentions are I know not; but be sure, that to whatever extremes you may go, you can wring nothing from me but what you have already heard. I once more assure you that I know of no treasonable correspondence whatsoever; and firm in my own innocence, I equally despise all attempts to bribe or to intimidate me."

"Sir, you are insolent?" replied the cardinal, rising: "Use no such language to me !--Are you not an insect I can sweep from my path in an instant ! Ho, a guard there without! We shall soon see whether you know aught of Philip of Spain."

Had the cardinal's glance been directed towards De Blenan, he would have seen, that at the name of Philip of Spain, a degree of paleness came over his check; but another object had caught Richelieu's eye, and he did not observe it. It was the entrance of the attendant whom he had despatched with the death-warrants, which now drew his notice; and well pleased to show De Blenau the dreadful means he so unscrupulously employed to extort confession from those he suspected, he eugerly demanded, "What news ?"

"May it please your eminence," said the attendant, "Caply died under the torture. In truth it was soon over with him, for he did not bear it above ten minutes."

"But the confession, the confession !" exclaimed Richelieu. "Where is the process verbal?"

"He made no confession, sir," replied the man.

was commanded, he woold have from a death of horror. Such is the stinacy." "Such," thought De Blenau, "is, un the reward of firmness and integrity. death is honorable in itself." No one could better read in the face passing in the mind that Richelien, and Ble that he easily say in the countenau Blenau, the feelings excited by what had Beenau, the recentings excises of what has sed. Ho remembered also the promise Chavigni ; and if, when he called the guan ever seriously proposed to arrest De Ble the high tone of the young count's language either unfelt or forgiven, for Richelien neve doned ; but it was as easy to arrest De Blenau doned; put it was as easy to arrest be blend Germain's as in Paris; and the wily ministed culated that by giving bim a little liberty, and ing him of his guard, he might be tempted in those things which would put him more in the power of the government of punishing him for hands and for his purposes. To arrest De Blenau would not the queen upon her guard; and therefore, the minister, without festitation, resolved to dissemble his resentment, and allow the count to depart in peace; reserving for another time the vengeance he had determined should overtakee him at last. Nor was his dissembling of that weak nature which those employ who have all the will to deceive, without the art of deceiving.

Richelieu walked rapidly up and down the closet for moment, as if striving to repress some strong emotion, then stepped, and turning to De Blenau with some frankness of manner, "Monsieur le Comte," said he, "I will own that you have heated me,—perhaps I have given way to it too much. But yon ought to be more careful of your words, sir, and remember that with men whose power you cannot resist, it is sometimes dangerous even to be in the right, much more to make them feel it rudely. However, it is all past, and I will now detain you no longer; trusting to your word that the information which I have received is without foundation. Let me only add, that you might have raised yourself this day to a height which few men in France would not struggle to attain. But that is past also, and may, perhaps, never retorn."

"I am most grateful, believe me," replied De Blenau, " for all the favors your eminence intended me; and I have no doubt that you will soon find some other person on whom to bestow them, much more worthy of them than myself."

Richelieu bowed low, and fixed his eyes upon the coust without a reply--a signal that the audience was over, which was not lost upon De Blenau, who rery gladly took his leave of the minister, hoping most devoutly never to see his face again. The ambiguity of his last sentence, however, had not escaped the cardinal.

"So. Monsieur de Blenau !" said he, as soon as the count had left him, " you can make speeches.

with a double meaning also ! Can you so f you may rue it though, for I will, find means to hend your proud spirit, or to break it; and that before three days be over. Is every thing prepared for my passage to Chantilly !" he continued, turning to the attendant.

"All is prepared, please your eminence," replied the man; " and as I passed I saw Monsieur de Chavigni getting into his chaise to set out."

"We will let him be an hour or two in advance," said the cardinal. "Send in the Marquis de Goumont;" and he again applied bimself to other affairs.

And the second s

or other states of the state of

CHAPTER XII.

"An entire new comedy, with new scenery, dresses, and decorations."

THE little village of Mesnil St. Loup, all insignificant as it is, was at the time of my tale a place of even less consequence than it appears now-a-days, when nine people out of ten have scarcely ever heard of its existence.

It was, nevertheless, a pretty-looking place; and had its little auberge on the same scale and in the same style as the village to which it belonged, small, neat, and picturesque, with its high pole before the door, crowned with a gay garland of flowers, which served both for sign and inscription to the inn; being fully as comprehensible an intimation to the peasantry of the day, that " Bon vin et bonne chere" were to be obtained within, as the most artful flourish of a modern sign-painter.

True it is that the little cabaret of Mesnil St. Loup was seldom troubled with the presence of a traveller; but there the country people would congregate after the labors of the day, and enjoy their simple sports with a relish that luxury knows not. The high road from Paris to Troyes passed quite in another direction ; and a stranger in Mesnil St. Loup was a far greater stranger than he could possibly have been anywhere else, except perhaps in newlydiscovered America. For there was nothing to excite either interest or curiosity; except it were the little church which had seen many a century pass over its primitive walls, remaining still unaltered, while five or six old trees, which had been its companions for time out of mind, began to show strong signs of decay in their rifted bark and falling where about the beginning of So phenomenon of a new face showed it St. Loup. The personage to whom it was a horseman of small mean appea having passed by the church, rode thro lage to the auberge, and having raised the garland over the door, he divined fi he himself would find there good champs and his horse would meet with enter equally adapted to his peculiar taste. the stranger alighted and entered the place he reception, without making any of the about himself, which the landlord seemed elined to do for him; but on the contrary s self down in the most shady corner, ordered the of wine, and inquired what means the he forded of satisfying his hunger, in a low quie of voice, which reached no farther than the he addressed. "As for wine," the host replied, " patable ortolan in a vine leaf, and a dish of stewed sorrol."

RICHELIEV.

The stranger underwent the innkeeper's oration with most exemplary patience, signified his approbation of the proposed dinner, without attacking the hare's reputation ; and when at length it was placed before him, he ate his meal and drank his wine in profound silence, without a word of praise or blame to either one or the other. The landlord, with all his sturdy loquacity, fuiled in more than one attempt to draw him into conversation ; and the hostess, though none of the oldest or ugliest, could scarce win a syllable from his lips, even by asking if he were pleased with his fare. The taciturn stranger merely bowed his head, and seemed little inclined to exert his oratorical powers, more than by the simple demand of what he wanted ; so that both mine host and hostess gave him up in despair -the one concluding that he was "an odd one," and the other declaring that he was as stupid as he was ugly.

This lasted some time, till one villager after another having exhausted every excuse for staying to hear whether the stranger would open his lips, dropped away in his turn, and left the apartment it was then, and not till then, that mine vacant. host was somewhat surprised by hearing the silent traveller pronounce in a most audible and imperative manner, "Gaultier, come here." The first cause of astonishment was to hear him speak at all ; and the next to find his own proper name of Gaultier so familiar to the stranger, forgetting that it had been vociferated at least one hundred times that night in his presence. However, Gaultier obeyed his summons with all speed, and approaching the stranger with a low reverence, begged to know his good-will and pleasure.

"Your wine is good, Gaultier," said the stranger, raising his clear gray eyes to the rosy round of Gaultier's physiognomy. Even an innkeeper is sus ceptible of flattery ; and Gaultier bent his head down tural too j-so rapidly does mankind p that theirs can be, at best, but a stage affection for their fellow-creatures. shuts the door-Drive on (-and it is all my dear sir, the gayeties, the care, and in which you and I live, render our heat inn, where many a traveller stays for an his score, and is forgetten. I am resol mine upon lease .-The bottle of wine was not long in mak pearance; and as Gaultier set it on the ore the stranger, he asked if he could a farther. "Can you show me the way to the old of St. Loup ?" demanded the stranger. "Surely, I can, sir," replied the inukeeper is to say, as far as knowing where it is. monsieur does not mean to-night." " ladeed do 1," answered the stranger; " and why not ? The night is the same as the day honest man." " No doubt, no doubt !" the greatest doub

RICHESTEU.

Huguenots—so I am no coward ;—but bless you, sir, I will tell you how it happened, and then you will sec—"

"I know all about it," replied the stranger, in a voice that made the innkeeper start, and look ever his left shoulder; "I know all about it; but sit down and drink with me, to keep your spirits up, for you must show me the way this very night. Pere Le Rouge was a dear friend of mine, and before he was burnt for a sorcerer, we had made a solemn compact to meet once every ten years. Now, if you remember aright, it is just ten years, this very day, since he was executed ; and there is no bond in hell fast enough to hold him from meeting me to-night at the old château. So sit you down and drink !"-And he poured out a full cup of wine for the innkeeper, who looked aghast at the portentous compact between the stranger and Pere La Rouge. However, whether it was that Gaultier was too much afraid to refuse, or had too much esprit de corps not to drink with any one who would drink with him, can hardly be determined now; but so it was, that sitting down, according to the stranger's desire, he poured the whole goblet of wine down his throat at one draght, and, as he afterwards averred, could not help thinking that the stranger must have enchanted the liquor, for no sooner had he swallowed it, than his fears of Père La Rouge began to die away, like morning dreams. However, when the goblet was drained. Gaultier began more justly to estimate the danger of drinking with a sovcerer; and that the stranger was such, a Champenois aubergiste of 1642 could never be supposed to doubt, after the diabolical compact so unscrupulously confessed. Under this impression, he continued rolling his empty cup about upon the table, revolving at the same time his own critical situation, and endeavoring to determine what might be his duty to his king and country under such perilous circumstances. Rolling the cup to the right-he resolved instantly to denounce this malignant enchanter to the prope

as heart overflowed thirst had therein a the nits of t ness, and he pitied from his soul that pe which could lead any human being liquor, comfortable lodging, and the so innkeeper, to a dark wood and a ruined old roasted sorcerer, and the devil perhap "Would you choose another bottle, manded Gaultier; and as his companion in head in token of assent, was about to pro this errand-with the laudable intention sharing all his newly arisen doubts and fea his gentle help-mate, who, for her part, was engaged in the soft domestic duties of scoldi stable-boy and boxing the maid's cars. stranger stopped him, perhaps divining, and no much approving the aforesaid communication. exclaimed, "La Bourgeoise min a tone of exemuted. So boundary in a tone of which over-powered all other, noises: the abust the dame herself—the tears of the maid—the of the maid—the tears of tears of tears of the maid—the tears of te pation of the stable-boy-the cackly and hens, which were on ; the barking of fresh h clouds overhead, had entirely left the sky, and all was gray.

At that moment the stranger drew forth his purse, let it fall upon the table with a hevy sort of clinking sound, showing that the louis-d'ors within had hardly room to jostle against each other. It was a sound of comfortable plenty, which had something in it irresistibly attractive to the ears of Gaultier; and as he stood watching while the stranger insinuated his finger and thumb into the little leathern bag, drawing forth first one broad piece and then another, so splendid did the stranger's traffic with the devil begin to appear in the eyes of the innkceper, that he almost began to wish that he had been brought up a sorcerer also.

The stranger quietly pushed the two pieces of gold across the table till they got within the innkeeper's sphere of attraction, when they become suddenly hurried towards him, with irresistible velocity, and were planged into the abyas of a large pocket on his left side, close upon his heart.

'The stranger looked on with philosophic composure, as if considering some natural phenomenon, till such time as the operation was complete. "Now, Gaultier," cried he. " put on your beaver, and lead to the beginning of the grove. I will find my way through it alone. But hark ye, say no word to your wife."

Gaultier was all complaisance, and having placed his hat on his head, he opened the door of the suberge, and brought forth the stranger's horse, funcying that what with a bottle of wine, and two pieces of gold, he could meet Beelzebub himself, or any other of those gentlemen of the lower house, with whom the care used to frighten the little boys and girls when they went to their first communion. However, the stranger had scarcely passed the horse's bridle over his arm, and led him a step or two on the way, when the cool air and reflection made the innkeeper begin to think differently of the devil, and he more inclined to keep at a respect

It is probable that he hands of Salas stranger was close behind, and cut off h At about a mile and a balf from the 1 of Mesnil, stood the old Chateau of St. asted upon an abropt eminence, command of almost all the country round. The va foot, and the slope of the hill up to its ve were covered with thick wood, through w eed the narrow deserted road from Menail in and out with a thousand turns and divad and twice completely encircling the hill itse fore it reached the castle gate, which once the state of former days, had rested to the state of former days and rested to the state of stantly open for the reception equally of the and the stranger, but which now only gave end to the winds and tompests -- rude guests, that tribated, even more than Time himself, the destroyer, to bring ruin and desolution on the serted mausion. attached to the chapel, lay many of that had once heat there, now Hard by, in a little shadowed the ceme)

RICHELIEC.

grave of the one, offered no greater fi attery to the monument of the other. But, beyond all these, and convert without the precincts of consecrated ground was a neap of shards and flints-the sorcerer's grave. Above it, some pious hand had raised the symmol of those days, wi church, like a . could pass but s there it rose, symbol shoul rounding obje sought it.

As the auberhill, which, lea manded a full low, and overh dy of poor Per d of charity, truly, in y was formed by the high road, and none ell. But, however, s, standing, as that igh above every surie view of all who mpanion climbed the llage of Mesail, comrich woody valley behich, since the tragedy of poor Pet ..., and acquired the name of the Sorcere. ..., ove, it was this tall white cross that first caught their attention. It stood upon the opposite eminence, distinctly marked on the background of the evening sky, tatching every ray of light that remained, while behind it, pile upon pile, lay the thick clouds of a coming storm.

"There, monsieur," cried Gaultier, "there is the cross upon the sorcerer's grave " And the foar which agitated him while he spoke, made the stranger s lip curl into a smile of bitter contempt. But as they turned the side of the hill, which had hitherto concealed the castle itself from their sight, the teeth of Gaultier actually chattered in his head, when he beheld a bright light shining from several windows of the deserted building.

"There!" exclaimed the stranger, "there, you see how well Pere Le Rouge keeps his appointment. I am waited for, and want you no farther. I can now find my way alone. I would not expose you, my friend, to the dangers of that grove."

The innkeeper's heart melted at the strangers' words, and he was filled with compassionate zeal "pon the occasion. "Pray don't go," cried Gaulveason », committing murder, and on_,and beresy and pleurisy, and s will go to the devil, indeed, and s hat will go to the devit, indeed you will-Ur. remember what I told you," "What is fated, is fated)", replied in a solemn voice, though Gaulter produced that sort of tremulous ton an inclination either to laugh or to cryised, and I must go, Bat let me was continued, storaly, "never to mention what has passed to night, if you would come again. For if you reveal one wo your wife, the ninth night after you have Pere Le Houge will stand on one side of and I on the other, and Salan at your feet will carry you away body and soul, so that never be heard of again," when he had concluded, the stranger w no reply, but sprang upon his horse, and down into the wood. In the mean time, the landlord el of the hill, from whence he village, and the sight of H

164

the clouds, followed instantly by a tremenduous peal of thunder. The terrified innkceper, startled at the sound, and more than ever convinced that man's enemy was on earth, took to his heels, nor ceased running till he reached his own door, and met his better angel of a wife, who boxed his cars for his absence, and vowed he had been gallanting.

CHAPTER XHL

The motto of which should be, "Out of the frying-pan into the fire."

The jingle of Claude de Blenau's spirs; as he desconded with a quick step die staircase of the Palais Cardinal, told as plainly as a pair of French spurs could tell, that his heart was lightened of a heavy load since he had last tried their ascent; and the spring of his foot, as he leaged upon his horse, spoke much of renewed hope and banished apprehension.

But the devil of it is (for I must use that homely but happy expression)—the devil of it is, that the rehound of hope mises us as much above the level of truth, as the depression of fear sinks us below it; and De Blenau, striking his spurs into the sides of his horse, cantered off towards St. Germain as gayly as if all doubt and danger were over, and began to look upon bastilles, tortures, and racks, with all the other et cetera of Richelieu's government, as little better than chimeras of the imagination, with which he had nothing further to do.

Hope sets off at a hand-gallop, Consideration soon contents herself with a more moderate pace, and Doubt is reduced, at best, to a slow trot. Thus, as De Blennu began to reflect, he unconsciously drew in the bridle of his horse : and before he had pro-

the courser and the counter der; De Blenau, knitting bis brow lip, as the various dangers that surrou and his mind 2 and the gentle barb, 3 mated by the same spirit as his maste arched neck; and throwing out his feet consideration as if the firm Chemin main had been no better than a quagmi De Bienau well knew that even in F. might smile, and smile, and be a villan the fair words of Richelieu too often pr most remorseless actions. He remember warning of Maslemoiselle de Bourborn, al strongly how insecure a warranty was innocence for his safety ; but still he posse sort of chivalroas pride which made him h flight as degrading under any circumstat more especially so when the danger was n parent. Like the lion, he might have slow ded the hunters while unattacked ; but ones sed by the chase, he turned to resist or to Such was the quality of his mind : sent instance he resolved firmness, whatse

Of these little motives I shall only pick out one as a specimen; but this one in the breast of a young 166 man of live-and-twenty, living is a romantic age, and blessed with a romantic disposition, may be considered all-sufficient. Now if it should be lovel-As I write this volume entirely for ladies, we are all agreed -- Love it was ! and who is there that will presume to say Claude de Blenau was not completely justified in resolving to bazard all, rather

As long as any hesitation had remained in the than part with Pauline de Beaumont ? mind of De Blennu, he had proceeded, as we have seen, with a slow unequal pace; but the moment his determination was fixed, his thoughts turned towards St. Germain's, and all his ideas concentrating into one of those day-dreams that every young heart is fond to indulge, he spurred on his horse, eager to realize some, at least, of the bright promises which hope so liberally held forth. It was late, however, before he arrived at the end of his journey; and internally cursing the etiquette which required him to change his dress before he could present himself at the paince, he sent forward his page to announce his return, and beg an audience

His toilet was not long; and without waiting for of the queen.

the boy's return, he set out on foot, hoping to join the queen's circle before it separated for the eve-In this he was disappointed. Anne of Aus tria was alone; and though her eyes sparkled with gladness for his unexpected return, and her reception was as kind as his good services required, De ning. Blenau would have been better pleased to have

"I could scarce credit the news till I saw you, been welcomed by other lips. non chambellan," said the queen, extending her hand for him to kiss; " nor can I traly believe that it is you that I behold even now. How have you esca-wea from that dreadful man i "I will tell your majesty all that has happened," caped from that dreadful man ?" replied the count; "and as I have a boon to ask, his stay in Paris. "And thus, madam " you see that Chavigni has kept his w it not been for that promise, I doubt have been even now comfortably lodged tille, with a table at his majesty's exper The queen mused for a moment with any reply; but from her countenance that she was not a little troubled by whit heard. "De Blenau," said she at length, in a melancholy voice, " there is something here. The cardinal has deeper plans in a Marie de Bourbon told you, they are ple ruin. When first I entered France, that blood and treachery resolved to make me He flattered my tastes, he prevented my like an insidious serpent be wound himself confidence; and I was weak enough to dre my husband's minister was my best friend. as much vanity as insolence, he mistook con sion for love. He sought his opportunity, an to insult my ears with his wishes you De Blennu, what must look to the present, De Blenau. As the mother of two princes, Richelieu both hates and fears me; and I see they are plotting my ruin. But yours shall not be involved therein. De Blenau, you must fly till this storm has passed by."

"Pardon me, madam," replied the coont, "but in this I cannot yield your majesty that obedience I would willingly show under any other circumstances. I cannot, I must not, fly. My own honor, madam, requires that I should stay; for if flight be not construed into an evidence of guilt, it may at least be supposed a sign of cowardice."

"Indeed, indeed! De Blenau," said the queen, ernestly, "you must do as 1 require; nay," she added with a mixture of sweetness and dignity, "as I command. If they can prove against you that you have forwarded letters from me to my brother the king of Spain, they will bring you to the block, and will most likely ruin me."

"I trust to the promise your majesty gave me when first I undertook to have those letters conveyed to your royal baother King Philip," answered De Blenau: "you then pledged to me your word that they were alone of a domestic nature, and that they should always continue so, without ever touching upon one subject of external or internal policy, so that my allegiance to my king and my duty to my country should alike remain pure and inviolate. I doubt not that your majesty has pointedly kept this promise; and De Blenau will never fly while he can lay his hand upon his heart and feel himself innocent."

"Yes, but remember, my good youth," replied the queen, "that this cardinal-my husband's tyrant rather than his subject—has commanded me, his queen, to forbear all correspondence with my brother, and has narrowly watched me to prevent that vory communication between Philip and myself which your kindness has found means to procure. Remember, too, his remorselesy nature; and then member that if there be proved against m well knew his safety deper small a crime as having sent these letter is inevitable, and there are modes of torn will wrench a secret from the most determ stancy." " I fear me," replied De Blenau, " that of mine must have much degraded me in jesty's opinion." "No, no, my friend ?" said the queen ; indeed-I do not doubt you in the least would fain persuade yon, De Blenzu, to that I know is best and safest." " Your majesty has now given me the st reasons for my stay,3 replied De Bleuau, smile ; " I have now the means of proving m ity to you, and nothing shall tempt me to lea at this moment. But in the mean time there favour I have to request." "Name it," replied the queen ; " indee Blennu, you might command it." " Your majesty is too good," said the count will make my story as brief as possible explain to you that

"Why, in truth, madam," answered De Blenau, " the difficulty arises with your majesty." " With me !" cried the queen : "with me, De Blenau! impossible ! Nothing could give me more pleasure than to see your anion. This Pauline of yours is one of the sweetest girls that ever I beheld; and with all her native unbought graces, she looks among the rest of the court like a wild rose in a flower-garden-not so cultivated, in truth, but more simply elegant, and sweeter than them all. Those who say that all is selfishness, let them tell me how it is that one simple word in praise of those we love will give a thousand times more pleasure than the warmest commendation of ourselves. De Blenau's heart beat, and his eye sparkled, and he paused a moment ere he could reply; nor indeed were his first sentences very distinct. said a great deal about her majesty's goodness,and his own happiness --- and Pauline's excellence; all in that sort of confused way, which would make it appear simple nonsense were it written down; but which very clearly conveyed to the queen linw much he loved Pauline, and how much obliged he was to her majesty for praising her. After this, he entered rather more regularly into a detail of those circumstances which had induced Mademniselle de Beaumont to suspect him. "The point which seems to affect her most," continued De Blenny, "is the visit with which Mademoiselle de Hauteford honored me by your majesty's command, in order to receive from me the last letter from your majesty to the King of Spain, which I was unhappily prevented from forwarding by my late wounds. Now this, as affecting the character of the lady your majesty employed in the business, does certainly require some explanation. In regard to every thing else. Pauline will, I feel sure, con-

"Oh, leave it all to me, leave it all to me " exsider my word sufficient." claimed the queen, laughing. ... What ! jealous al leave love without jealousy. A woman is ve silv convinced where she loves, and it will be if I cannot show her that she has been in the w But take no unworthy advantage of it, De Bier she continued ; "for a woman's heart will not." tate at triffes, when she wishes to make repara to a man she loves." "All the advantage I could ever wish to tak replied the count, "would be, to claim her ha " Nay, nay-that is but a fair advantage," said th queen. "Yet," continued she, after a moment panse, " it were not wise to draw the eyes of susp cinn upon us at this moment. But there are such things as private marriages, De Blenau." There was no small spice of romance in the character of Anne of Austria, and this, on more than one occasion, led her into various circumstances of danger, affecting both herself and the state. Of an easy and generous spirit, she always became partisan of the oppressed, and any thin grave of the one, offered no greater flattery to the monument of the other. But, beyond all these, and encores without the precincts of consecrated ground was a neap of shards and flints—the sorcerers grave. Above it, some pious hand had raised the symbol of salvation—a deed of charity, truly, in these days, when eternal mercy was formed by the church, like a turnpike on the high road, and none could pass but such as paid toll. But, however, there it roac, a tall white cross, standing, as that symbol should always stand, high above every surrounding object, and full in the view of all who sought it.

As the aubergiste and his companion climbed the hill, which, leading from the village of Mesail, commanded a full prospect of the rich woody valley below, and overhung that spot which, since the tragedy of poor Père Le Rouge, had acquired the name of the Sorcerer's Grove, it was this tall white cross that first caught their attention. It stood upon the opposite eminence, distinctly marked on the background of the evening sky, catching every ray of light that remained, while behind it, pile upon pile, lay the thick clouds of a coming storm.

"There, monsieur," cried Gaulter, "there is the cross upon the sorcerer's grave!" And the foar which agitated him while he spoke, made the strangers lip curl into a smile of bitter contempt. But as they turned the side of the hill, which had hitherto concealed the castle itself from their sight, the teeth of Gaultier actually chattered in his head, when he beheld a bright light shining from several windows of the deserted building.

"There !" exclaimed the stranger, "there, you see how well Père Le Rouge keeps his appointment. I am waited for, and want you no farther. I can now find my way alone. I would not expose you, my friend, to the dangers of that grove."

The innkeeper's heart melted at the strangers' words, and he was filled with compassionate zeal upon the occasion. "Pray don't go," cried Gaul-

RICHELIEG.

ther, almost blubbering betwirt fear and tenderheartedness; " pray don't go! Have pity upon your precious sou! Y ou'll go to the devil, indeed you will !--or at least to purgatory for a hundred thousand years, and be burnt up like an overdone rabbit. You are committing murder, and conspiracy, and treason, "--the stranger started, but Gaultier went on--"and hereay, and pleurisy, and sorcery, and you will go to the devil, indeed you will---and then you'll remember what I told you."

"What is fated, is fated!" replied the stranger, in a solemn voice, though Gauluer's speech had produced that sort of tremulous tone, excited by an inclination either to laugh or to cry "I have promised, and I must go. But let me warn you," he continued, sternly, "never to mention one word of what has passed to night, if you would live till I come again. For if you reveal one word, even to your wile, the ninth night after you have done so, Père Le Rouge will stand on one side of your bed, and I on the other, and Satan at your feet, and we will carry you away body and acoul, so that you shall never be heard of again."

When he had concluded, the stranger waited for no reply, but sprang upon his horse, and galloped down into the wood.

In the mean time, the landlord climbed to a point of the hill, from whence he could see both his own village, and the ruins of the castle. There, the sight of the church steeple gave him courage, and he paused to examine the extraordinary light which proceeded from the ruin. In a few minutes, he saw several figures fil across the windows, and cast a momentary obscurity over the red glare which was streaming forth from them upon the darkness of the night. "There they are!" cried he, "Père Le Rouge, and his pot companion l-and surely two devil must be with them, for 1 see more than two, and one of them has certainly a tail-Lord have mercy upon us!"

As he spoke, a vivid flash of lightning burst from

As soon as De Blenau entered this scene of unprincely confusion, the quick eyes of Anne of Austria lighted upon him, and, advancing from the group of ladies to whom she had been speaking, she scenned surprised to see him in the simple morning costame-of the court.

"Why, De Blenau !" exclaimed she, "we wait for you, and you have neither boots nor cloak. Have you not seen the page I sent to you !"

"No, indeed, madam," replied De Blenau; "but having loitered in the park some time, I have probably thus missed receiving your commands."

"Then you have not heard," said the queen, "we have been honoured this morning by a summons to join the king at Chantilly."

"Indeed." rejoined De Blenau, thoughtfully, "What should this mean, I wonder ? It is strange ! Richelieu was to be there last night : so I heard it rumored yesterday in Paris."

" I fear me," answered the queen, in a low tone, " that the storm is about to burst upon our head. A servant informs me, that riding this morning, shortly after sunrise, uear that small open space which separates this, the forest of Laye, from the great wood of Mantes, he saw a large party of the cardinal's guard winding along towards the wooden bridge, at which we usually cross the river."

"Oh, I think nothing of that," replied the count. "Your majesty must remember, that this cardinal has his men scattered all over the country :-but, at all events, we can take the stone bridge farther down. At what time does your majesty depart ? J will but pay my compliments to these ladies, and then go to command the attendance of my train, which will at all events afford some sort of escort."

During this dialogue, the queen had looked from time to time towards the group of ladies who remained in conversation at the other end of the apartment; and with that unsteadiness of thought peculiar to her character, she soon forgot all her fears and anzieties, as she saw the dark eve of Pauline of paying your compliments to more those ladies, and she shall stand y all the rest. Panline-Mademoisel mont," she continued, raising her vi hither, flower! I would speak a work Pauline came forward-not unhapi but with the blood rushing up into and forehead till, timidity became as while the clear cold blue eyes of Man de Hauteford followed her across the ro she wondered at feelings she herself rently never experienced. De Bienau advanced and held out Pauline instantly placed here in it, and confusion of the moment laid the other "Well," said the queen with a smile Bienau, you must be satisfied now. Nay, ashamed Pauline; it is all right and pur natural." "I am not ashamed, madam " coming to gain comlover:

and in less than half an hour De Blenau rejoined the party in the saloon of the palace.

"Now, De Blenau," said the queen, as soon as she saw him, " you are prepared for travelling at all points. For once be ruled, and instead of accompanying me to Chantilly, make the best of your way to Franche Comté or to Flanders, for 1 much fear that the cardinal has not yet done with you. I will take care of your interests while you are gone, even better than I would my owa; and I promise you that as noon as you are in alety. Madame De Beaumont and Pauline shall follow you, and you may be happy surely, though abroad, for a few short years, till Richelieu's power or his life be presed away."

De Blenna smiled. "Nay, nay," replied he, a that would not be like a gallant knight and true, either to desort my queen or my fady love. Basides, I am inclined to believe that this journey to Chantily bodes us good rather than harm, For near three months past, the king has been there almost alone with Cinq Mars, who is as noble a heart as e'er the world produced, and is woll affected towards your majesty. So I am lowking forward to brighter days."

booking forward to brighter days." "Well, we shall see," snid the queen, with a doubtful shake of the head. "You are young, De Blenzau, and full of hopes-all that has passal away with me. Now let us go. I have ordered the carriages to wait at the end of the terrace, and we will walk thither --perhaps it may be the last time I shall ever see my favourite walk; for who knows if any of as will ever return ?"

With these melancholy anticipations, the queen took the arm of Madame de Besumont, and, followed by the rest, led the way to the terrace, from which was to be seen the vast and beautiful view extending from St. Germain's over Paris to the country beyond, taking in all the wind-

now and then the sanious delta and now and then the sanious would fower or a spice in the distant create a glittering spot amid the the various della antani It is ever a bright scene, that y Germain, and many have been the p fair, and the noble, whose feet has terrace of Henry the Fourth j but seldom, has there been there a group loveliness or honor than that which is ed Anne of Austria from the palace. choly which hung over the whole party them any wish for farther conversatio. casual comment upon the beauties of the state of the stat they had approached within a few hundre of the extremity, where they were awai the carriages prepared for the queen and dies, together with the attendants of nau. At that moment the armed men was h one imm wards the carriages with a degree of anxiety in her eye, which speedily communicated feelings of the same kind to her attendants. Pauline, unacquainted with the intrigues and anxieties of the court, saw from the countenances of all around that something was to be apprehended; and magnifying the danger from uncertainty in regard to its nature, she instinctively crept close to De Blenau, as certain of finding protection there.

RICHELIEP.

Judging at once the cause of De Thiory's coming, De Blenau drew the arm of Pauline through his, and lingered a step behind, while the rest of the party proceeded.

"Dear Pauline!" said he, in a low but firm tone of voice, "my own Pauline! prepare yourself for what is coming! I think you will find that this concerns me. If, so, farnwell! and remember, whatever be my fate, that De Bleana has loved you ever faithfully, and will love you till find hast hourbeyond that-God only knows ! but if ever human affection passed berond the tomb, my love for you will endure in another state."

By this time they had reached the steps, at the bottom of which the carriages were in waiting, and at the same moment the long atrides of the Count de Thiery had brought him to the same spot.

"Well, Monsieur de Thiery!" stid Anne of Austria, turning shurp round, and speaking in that shull tone which her oten assamed whenever she was agitated either by fear or anger; your haste implies had news. Dees your business he with me ?"

"No, so please your majesty." replied the old soldier: "no further than to wish you a fur journey to Chantilly, and to have the pleasure of seeing your majesty to your earninge."

The queen paused, and regarded the old man for a moment with a steady eye, while he locked down apon the ground and played with the point of he approximately bound of the provident of the provident of the provident of the point of the provident of the provident of the point of the provident of the provident of the point of the provident of the provident of the point of the provident of the provident of the point of the provident of the provident of the point of the provident of the point of the point of the point of the provident of the point of the point of the point of the provident of the point of the poin

but from which all embarrassment w ed. "Monsieur de Blenau," he conti a most unplansant task to accomplish to any you must give me up your swon aured that you render it to a man of ho keep it as a precious and invaluable chi can give it back to that hand, which he ed will always use it nobly." "I foresaw it plainly is cried the g turned away her head. Pauline clasped and burst into tears : but among the atte De Blenau, who during this conversation has one mounted the steps of the terrace, th first a whisper, then a lond marmar, then a indignation, and in a moment a dozen sword gleaming in the sunshine. Old De Thiery laid his hand upon his w but De Blenna stopped bim in his purpose. "Silence's cried he in a voice of "Traitors, pat up your swords's My root added he, in a gentler tone, ed, " those swords fended

RICHELIEV.

De Blenau led the queen to the carriage in silence, and having handed her in, he hissed the hand she extended to him, begging her to rely upon his honor and firmness. He next gave his hand to Pauline de Beaamont, down whose cheeks the tears were streaming unrestrained. "Farewell, dear Pauline! farewell " he said. Her sols prevented her answer, but her hand clasped upon his with a fond and lingering pressure, which spoke more to his heart than the most elouguent adicu.

Madame de Beaumont came next, and embraced him warmly. "God protect you, my son !" said the, " for your heart is a noble one."

Mademoiselle de Hauteford followed, graeting De Blenau with a calm cold smile and a graceful bow; and the rest of the royal suite having placed themselves in other carriages, the cavalcade moved on. De Blenau stood till they were gone. Raising his hat, he howed with an air of unslaken dignity, as the queen passed, and then turning to the terrace, he took the arm of the Count de Thiery, and returned a prisoner to the palace.

CHAPTER XIV.

Which gives an example of "The way to keep him."

"WELL, sir," said De Blenau, smiling with feelings mugled with melancholy resignation to his fate and proud disdain for his enemies, "imprisonment is too common a lot, now-a-days, to be matter of surprise, even where it falls on the most immocent. Our poor country, France, seems to have be come one great labyrinth, with the Bastille centre, and all the roads terminating there. I suppose that such is my destination."

AICHELIEU.

"I am sorry to say it is," replied his companion. "My orders are to carry you thither direct; but I hope that your sojourn will not be long within its walls. Without doubt you will soon be able to clear yourself."

"I must first know of what I am accused," replied the count. "If they cry in my case, as in that of poor Clement Marot, Prenez le, il a mangé le lard, I shall certainly plead guilty; but I know of no state crime which I have committed, except eating meat on a Friday.—It is as well, perhaps, Monsieur de Thiery," continued he, falling into a graver tone, "to take these things lightly. I can not imagine that the cardinal means me harm; for he must well know that I have done nothing to deserve ill, either from my king or my country. Pray God his eminence's breast be as clear as mine!"

"Umph !" cried the old soldier, with a meaning shake of the head, "I should doubt that, De Blennu, You have neither had time nor occasion to get it so choked up as doubtless his must be. But these are bad subjects to talk upon ; though I swear to Heaven, Sir Count, that when I was sent upon this errand, I would have given a thousand livers to have found that you had been wise enough to set out last night for some other place."

"Innocence makes one incautious," replied Da Blenau; "but I will own, I was surprised to find that the business had been put upon you."

"So was 1," rejoined the other. "I was astonished, indeed, when I received the lettre de cachet. But a soldier has nothing to do but to obey, Monsieur de Blenau. It is true, I one time thought to make an excuse; but, on reflection, I found that it would do you no good, and that some one midelt be sent to whom you would less willingly give your sword than to old De Thiery. But have weather the palace, sir. There is a carriage in weather will you take any refreshment before you get

RICHELIEU,

The prospect of imprisonment for an uncertain period, together with a few little evils, such as torture, and death in the perspective, had not greatly increased De Blenau's appetite, and he declined accepting the Count de Thiery's offer, but requested that his page might be allowed to accompany him to Paris. The orders of Richelicu, however, were strict in this respect, and De Thiery was obliged to refuse. " But," added he, " if the boy, has wit, he may smuggle himself into the Bastile afterward. Let him wait for a day or two, and then crave of the jailor to see you. The prison is not kept so close as those on the outside of it imagine. I have been in more than once myself to see friends who have been confined there. There was poor La Forte, who was afterward beheaded, and the Chevalier de Caply, who is in there still. 1 have seen them both in the Bastille."

"You will never see the Chovalier de Caply again," replied De Blenan, shuddering at the rememberance of his fate. "He died yesterday morning under the torture."

"Grand Dieu!" exclaimed De Thiery; "this cardinal prime minister stands on no ceremonies. Here are five of my friends he has made away with in six months. There was La Forte, whom I mentioned just now, and Boissy, and De Reineville, and St. Cheron; and now, you tell me, Caply too; and if you should chance to be beheaded, or die under the torture, you will be the sixth."

"You are kind in your anticipations, sir," replied De Blenau, smiling at the old man's blunness, yet not particularly enjoying the topic. "But having done nothing to merit such treatment, I hope I shall not be added to your list,"

"I hope not, I hope not !" exclaimed De Thiery, "God forbid' I think, in all probability, you will escape with five or six weeks imprisonment; and what is that ?"

"Why, no great matter, if considered philosophically," answered De Blenau, thoughtfully. " And yet, Monsieur de Thiery, liberty is a great thing. The vory freedom of walking amid all the beauties of the vast creation, of wandering at our will from one perfection to another, is not to be lost without a sigh. But it is not that alone—the sense, the feeling of liberty, is too innately dear to the soul of man to be purfed with as a toy."

While De Blenau thus spoke, half reasoning with himself, half addressing his conversation to the old soldier by his side, who, by long service, had been nearly drilled into a machine, and could not, consequently enter fully into the feelings of his more youthful companion, the carriage which was to convey them to Paris was brought round to the gate of the palace at which they stood. Figure to yourself, my dearly beloved reader, a vehicle in which our good friend, the Giant Magog, of Guildhall, could have stood upright; its long sides bending inwards with a graceful sweep, like the waist of Sir Charles Grandison in his best and stiffest coat; and then conceive all this mounted upon an interminable perch, connecting the heavy pairs of wheels, which, straggling and far apart, looked like two unfortunate hounds coupled together against their will, and eternally struggling to get away from each other. Such was the chaise roulante which stood at the gate of the palace, ready to convey the prisoner to Paris. The preparations that had been made for De Blenau's journey to Chantilly, now served for this less agreeable expedition; and the various articles which he conceived would be necessary to his comfort, were accordingly disposed about the vehicle, whose roomy interior was not likely to suffer from

It is and to say farewell to any thing, and more especially where uncertainty is mingled with the adiou. Had it been possible, De Blenau would fain have quitted St. Germain's without encountering, the fresh pain of taking leave of his attendants 5 but hose who had seen his arrest, had by this time communicated the news to those who had remained in the town, and they now all pressed round to kiss his hand, and take a last look of their kind-hearted lord, before he was lost to them, as they feared, for ever. There was something affecting in the scene, and a glistening moisture rose even in the eye of the old Count de Thiery, while De Blenau, with a kind word to say to each, bade them farewell, one after another, and then sprang into the carriage that was to convey him to a prison.

repletion.

RICHTLM.C.

The vehicle rolled on for some way in silence, but at length De Blenau soud, "Monsieur de Thiery, you mast excuse me if I sm somewhat grave. Even conscious rectitude cannot make such a journey as this very palatable. And besides," he added, "I have to day parted with some that are very dear to me."

"I saw that, I saw that," answered the old soldier. "It was bad enough paring with so many kind hearts as stoud round you just now, but that was a worse farewell at the end of the ternoce. Now out upon the policy that can make such bright eyes shed such bitter tears. I can hardly get those eyes out of my head, old as it is.—Oh, if I were but forty years younger!"

"What then ?" demanded De Blenau, with a

"Why, perhaps I might have ten times more pleasure in lodging you safe in the Bastille than I have now," huswered De Thiery. "Oh. Monsieur de Bleangt, take my word for it, age is the most terrible misfortune that can happen to any man; other evils will mend, but this is every day getting worse."

The conversation between De Blenau and his companion soon dropped, as all conversation must do, unless it be forced, where there exists a great dissimilarity of ideas and circumstances. It is true, from time to time, Monsicor de Thiery uttered an observation which called for a reply from De Blenau; but the thoughts which crowded upon the young count were too many, and too overpowering in their nature to find relief in utterance. The full dangers of his situation, and all the wagne and horrible probabilities which the future offered, presented themselves more forcibly to bis mind now that he had leisure to dwell upon them, than they had done at first, when all his energies had been called into action 5 and when, in order to conceal their effect from others, he had been obliged to fly from their consideration himself.

PLOTELIEU.

A thousand little accessory circumstances also kept continually renewing the recollection of his painful situation. When he dropped his hand, as was his custom, to rest it upon the hilt of his sword, his weapon was gone, and he had to remember that he had been disarmed; and if by chance he cast his eyes from the window of the carriage, the passing and repassing of the guards continually reminded him that he was a prisoner De Blenau was new to misfortune, and consequently the more sensible to its acuteness. Nor did he possess that buoyant spirit with which some men are happily gifted by nature-that sort of carelessness which acts better than philosophy, raising us above the sorrows and uncomforts of existence, and teaching us to bear our misfortunes by forgetting them as soon as possible. He had too much courage, it is true, to resign himself to grief for what he could not avoid. He was prepared to encounter the worst that fate could bring, but at the same time he could not turn his thoughts from the contemplation of the future. though it offered nothing but dark instinct shapes ; and out of these his imagination formed many horrible images, which derived a greater appearance of reality from the known cruelty of Richelieu, in whose power he was, and the many dreadful deeds perpetrated in the place to which he was going.

Thus passed the hours away as the carriage relled on towards Paris It may be well supposed that such a vehicle as I have described did not more whit any great celerity ; and I much doubt whether the act of parliament place which hackney cosches obliged to adhere to, would not have jolted the unhappy chaise roulante limb from limb, if it had been rigorously enforced. But it so happened that the machine itself was the personal property of Monsieur de Thiery, who always styled it une belle voiture ; and looking upon it as the most perfect specimen of the coach-building art, he was mighty cautious concerning its progression. This the postillion was well aware of, and therefore never ventured upon a greater degree of speed than might carry them over the space of two miles in the course of an hour ; but notwithstanding such prudent moderation, the head of Monsieur de Thiery would often be protruded from the window, whenever an unfriendly rut gave the wheels a jolt, exclaimed loudly, " Holloa ! postillion ! gardes vous de carser ma belle roiture ;" and sundry other adjurations, which did not serve to increase the rapidity of their progress:

RICHELIED.

Such tedious waste of time, together with the curious graing of the multitude at the state-prisener, and uncertain calculations as to the future, created for De Blenau a state of torment to which the Bastille at once would have been relief; so that he soon began most davoutly to wish his companion and the curriage and the postillion all at the devil together for going so slowly. But, however tardily time's wings seem to move, they bear him away from us notwithstanding. Night overtook the travellers when they were about a league from Paris, and the heaviest day De Blenau had ever yet known found its end at last.

Avoiding the city as much as possible, the carriage passed round and entered by the Porte St. Antoines, and the first objects which presented therasolves to the eyes of De Blenau, after passing the gates, were the large gloomy towers of the Bastille, standing lone and naked in the motonlight, which showed nothing but their dark and irregular form, strongly contrasted with the light and rip pling water that flowed like melted silver in the fosse below.

RICHELLEU

One of the guards had ridden on, before they entered the city, to announce their approach; and as soon as the carriage came up, the outer drawbridge fell with a heavy clang, and the gates of the court opening, admitted them through the dark gloomy porch into that famous prison, so often the scene of horror and of crime. At the same time, two men advancing to the door, held each a lighted torch to the window of the carriage, which, flashing with a red gleam upon the rough stone walls, and gloomy archways on either side, showed plainly to De Blenau all the frowning features of the place, rendered doubly horrible by the knowledge of its purpose.

A moment alterward, a fair, (soft-looking mun, dressed in a black velvet pourpoint (whom De Blenan discovered to be the governor), approached the carriage with an official paper in his hand, and lighted by one of the attendant's torches, read as follows, with that sort of hurried draw) which showed it to be a matter of form :--

"Monsieur le Comte de Thiery," said he, "you are commanded by the king to deliver into my hands the body of Claude Count de Blenau, to hold and keep in strict imprisonment, until such time as his majesty's will be known in his regard, or till he be acquitted of the orimes with which he is charged, by a competent tribunal; and I new require youto do the same."

This being gone through, De Thiery descended from the carriage, followed by the Count De Bienau, whom the governor instantly addressed with a profound how and service smile.

"Monsieur de Blenau," said he. " vou are welcome to the Bastille; and any thing I can do for your accourne.lation, consistent with my duty, you shall command."

"I hope you will let it be so, Sir Governor,' said old De Thiery; for Monsieur De Blenau is my particular friend, and without doubt he will be liberated in a few days. Now, Monsieur de Blenau," continued he, "I must leave you for the present, but hope soon to see you in another place. You will, no doubt, find several of your friends here; for we all take it in turn : and indeed, new-a-days, it would be almost accounted a piece of ignorance not to have been in the Bastille once in one's life. So, farewell!" And he embraced him warmly, whispering as he did so, "Make a friend of the governor--gold will do it!"

RICHELTEU.

De Blenau tooked after the good old soldier with feelings of regret, as he got into his bells coiture and drove through the archway. Immediately after the drawbridge rose, and the gates closed with a clang, sounding on De Blenau's ears, as if they shut out from him all that was friendly in the world; and overpowered by a feeling of melancholy desolation, he remained with his eyes fixed in the direction De Thiery had taken, till he was roused by the governor laying his hand upon his arm. "Monsieou de Blenau," said he, "will you do me the favour of following me, and I will have the honour of showing you your apartment."

De Blennu obeyed in silence, and the governor led the way into the inner court, and thence up the chief staircase to the second story, where he stopped at a heavy door plated with iron, and suck deep in the stone wall, from the appearance of which De Blenau did not argue very favourably of the chambers within. His anticipations, however, were agreeably disappointed, when one of the attendants, who lighted them, pulled aside the bolts, and throwing open the door, exposed to his view a large neat room, fitted up with every attention to comfort, and even some attempt at elegance. This, the governor informed him, was destined for hisuse while he did the Bastille the honor of making chateau, and had not had time to arrange it since its last occupant had left them, which was only the it his abode ; and he then went on in the same pohie strain to apoligize for the furniture being in some disorder, as the servants had been very busy in the morning before. So far De Blenau might have imagined himself in the house of a polite friend, had not the bolts and bars obtruded themselves on his view wherever he turned, speaking strongly of a prison.

"The end of the governor's speech also was more in accordance with his office: " "My orders, Monsieur de Blenau," sid he in continuation, " are to pay every attention to your comfort and convenience, but at the same time to have the strictest guard over you. I am therefore obliged to deny you the Liberty of the court, which some of the prisoners enjoy, and I must also place a sentinel at your door. I will now go and give orders for the packages which were in the carriage to be brought up here, and will then return immediately to advise with you on what can be done to make your time pass more pleasantly."

Thus saying, be quitted the apartment, and De Blenau heard the heavy bolts of the door grate into their sockets with a strange feeling of reluctance ; for though he felt too surely that liberty was gone, yet he would fain have shrunk from those outward marks of captivity which continually forced the recollection of it upon his mind. The polite attentions of the governor, however, had not escaped his notice, and his thoughts soon returned to that officer's conduct.

"Can this man," thought he, " continually accustomed to scenes of blood and horror, be really gentle in his nature, as he seems to show himself? or can it be that he has especial orders to treat me with kindness? Yet here I am a prisoner, and for what purpose, unless they intend to employ the most fearful means to draw from me those secrets which they have failed in obtaining otherwise ?"

Such was the nature of his first thoughts for a moment or two after the governor had left him i but rousing himself after a little, from reverses which threw no light upon his situation, he began to examine more closely the apartment which bade fair to be his dwelling for some time to come.

It was evidently one of the best in the prison, consisting of two spacious chambers, which occupied the whole breadth of the square tower in the centre of the Bastille. The first, which opened from the starcase and communicated with the second by means of a small door, was conveniently furnished in its way, containing, besides a very fair complement of chairs and tables of the most solid manufacture, that happy invention of our succestors, a corter cuphored jarnished with various articles of plate and porcelain, and a shelf of books, which last be Blenau had no small pleasare in perceiving.

On one of the tables were various implements for writing, and on another the attendant who had lighted them thither had placed two silver lamps, which, though of an antique fashion, served very well to light the whole extent of the room. Raising one of these, De Blenau proceeded to the inner chamber, which was fitted up as a bedroom, and contained various articles of forniture in a more modern taste than that which decorated the other. But the attention of the prisoner was particularly attracted by a heavy iron door nare the head of the bed, which, however, as he gladly perceived, possessed belts on the inside, so as to prevent the approach of any one from without during the night.

So much of our happiness is dependent on the trifles of personal comfort, that De Blenan, though little coring in general for very delicate entertainment, nevertheless feit himself more at ease when, on looking round his apariment, he found that at all overts it was no dungeon to which he had been coningued: and from this he dewn a favorable augury, flattering himself that no very severe measures would altimately he pursued towards him, when such care was taken of his temporary accommodation.

De Bienau had just time to complete the peram bulation of his new abode when the governor re-as soon as these were properly s these we packages w the apartment, the governor comma lites to withdraw, and remained alon oner, who, remembering the last we Count de Thiery, resolved, as far as po the good will of one who had it in h only to soften or to aggravate the pain tivity, but even the second and the second s first De Biepau felt some localation as priety of offering cordid coin to a man responsible a situation, and no small emba as to the manner. These feelings kept h for a moment, during which time the got mained silent also, regarding him me used police and affabic smile, as if he expected "I will try the experiment at all events." De Blenna, "I could almost persuade mys Lockny it an happened. comprised ance to accept what De Blenau proffered. The purse dropped unrejected into his open palm, and it was very evident that his future conduct would greatly depend upon the amount of its contents, according as it was above or below his expectation.

"Monseigneur," replied he. " you are very good, and seem to understand the trouble which prisoners sometimes give, as well as if you had lived in the Bastille all your life; and you may depend upon it, as I said before, that every thing shall be done for your accommodation---always supposing it within my duty."

"I doubt you not, sir." answered De Blenau, who from the moment the governor's flugers had closed upon the purse, could hardly help regarding him as a menial who had taken his wages : "I doubt you not; and at the present moment I should be glad of supper, if such a thing can be procured within your walls."

"Most assuredly it can be procured to-night, sir," replied the governor; "but I am sorry to say, that we have two meager days in the week, at which times neither meat nor wine is allowed by government, even for my own table : which is a very great and serious grievance, considering the arduous duties I am often called upon to perform."

" But of course such things can be procured from without?" said De Blenau; "and on the days you have mentioned. I beg that you would not allow my table to bear witness of any such regulations: and farther, as I suppose that you, sir, have the command of all this, I will thank you to order your purveyor to supply all that is usual for a man of my quality and fortune, for which he shall have immediate payment through your hands."

The tone in which De Blenau spoke was certainly somewhat authoritative for a prisoner; and feeling, as he proceeded, that he might give offence where it was his best interest to conciliate regard, he added though not without pain,...

"When you will do me the honour to partake my

RICHELIES.

I say to-morrow at diuner, that I shall have pleasu e of your company ?"

The governor readily accepted the invite more especially as the ensuing day chanced is one of those meager days, which he held in particular abhorence. And now, having made : farther arrangements with De Blenau, he left promising to send the meal which he had den ed.

There is sometimes an art in allowing one's to be cheated, and De Blenau had at once per ed that the best way to bind the governor to h terest, was, not only to suffer patiently, but ev promote every thing which could gratify the cu ty of bis jailer or his underlings; and thus he laid much stress upon the provision of his t shout which he was really indifferent.

Well contented with the liberality of his prisoner, and praying God most devoutly that cardinal would spare his life to grace the anna the Bastille for many years, the governor took to send De Blenau immediately, the supper w had been prepared for binself; an act of genere of which few jailers, high or low, would have guilty.

It matters little how De Blenau relished his n suffice it, that the civility and attention he ex enced, greatly removed his apprehensions for future, and made him imagine that no serious ceedings were intended against him. In this f of mind, as soon as the governor's servant's ha ken away the remains of his supper, and the were drawn upon him for the night, he took a from the sheef, thinking that his mind was suffic ly composed to permit of his thus occupying it some more pleasing employment than the use contemplation of his own fate. But he was mu en. He had scarcely read a sentence, befo thoughts, flying from the lettered page bel eyes, had again sought out all the strange up FOL. T. 13 points of his situation, and regarding them under every light, strove to draw from the present some pressage for the future. Thus finding the attempt in vain, he threw the book hashily from him, in order to give himself up calmly to the impulse he could not resist. But as the volume fell from his hand upon the table, a small piece of written paper flew outfrom between the leaves, and after having made a circle or two in the air, fell lightly to the ground.

RICHELING

De Blenan carelessly took it up, supposing it some casual annotation; but the first few words that caught his eye riveted his attention. It hegan-

"To the next wretched temant of these apartments I bequeathed a secret, which, though useless to me, may be of service to him. To-day I am condemned, and to-morrow I shall be led to the turture or to death. I am innocent ; but knowing that innocence is not safety, I have endeavoured to make my escape, and have by long labour filed through the lock of the iron door near the bed, which wan! the sole fastening by which it was secured from without. Unfortunat ly, this door only leads to a small turret staircase communicating with the innercourt ; but should my successor in this abode of misery be, like me, debarred from exercise; and also from all converse with his fellow-prisoners, this information may be useful to him. The file with which I accomplished my endeavour is behind the shelf which contains these books. Adieu, whoever thou art Pray for the soul of the unhappy Caply !"

As he read, the hopes which De Bleam had conceived from the comforts that were allowed him flad in air. There also, in the same apartment, and attanded with the same care, had the wretched Cuply lingered away the last hours of an existence about to be terminated by a dreadfol and agonizing deat . "And such may be my fate," thought De BlenBu with an involuntary shudder, springing from that antipathy which all things living bear to death. But the moment after, the blood rushed to his check,

Without venturing out of the shadow of the tow er, De Bienau returned to his apartment, feeling a degree of satisfaction in the idea that he should not now be cut off from all communication with those below in case he should desire it. He no longer eft so absolutely lovely as before, when his situaon and appeared almost as much insulated as many those that the lower dungeons of that very buildg contrined, who were condemned to drag out the et of their years in nearly unbroken solitade. Having replaced the paper in the book, for the ent of any one who might be confined there e, De Blenan fastened the iron de erwise so well secured.

fore him a little winding stone staircase, fill whole of one of the small towers; which c ing no chambers and only serving as a back to the apartments in the square tower, had suffered in some degree to go to decay. The were pierced with loop-holes, which being e ed by some of the stones having fallen away forded sufficient aperture for the moonlight to the interior with quite enough power to perm De Blenau's descending without other light. L ing the Jamp, therefore in the hed-room, he ceeded down the steps till they at once opened fr the turret into the inner court, where all was more light and silence, it being judged unnecessary, all the prisoners were locked in for the hight, to at tion ev n a single sentry in a place which was of though no one was present to witness "What !" thought he, "I who have death a thousand times, to tremble at it a ever, let me see the truth of what this po and entering the bed-room, he approaches door, of which he easily drew back the bo having taking care to grease them with oil lamp, so that they moved without creat smallest noise. The moment that these were drawn, the push opened the door, and De Bienau bei

reproaching him for yielding to suc

side, and addressing his prayers to Heaven, he laid himsel' down to rest. For some time his thoughts resumed their former train, and continued to wander over his si vation and its probable termination, but at length his ideas became confused, memory and perception gradually lost their activity, while fatigue and the remaining weakness from his late wounds overcame him, and he slept.

CHAPTER XV.

Which shows a new use for an old castle; and gives a good receipt for leading a man by the cose.

Now if the reader imprired that I wrate the while of the isolith chapter for the sole purpose of beiling a contranda bail story about a country innkeeper and a conjuror's first course, he was very much mistaken. Let him immediately transport himself back to the little village of Mesnil St. Loop, and let him remember the church, and the oid trees, and the runced castle leyond, with all the circumstances therefore appending; and if any thing that has since passed has put the particulars out of his mind, let him return to the aforesaid twelfth chapter, and learn it by heart, as a pennance for having forgottenit. But if, on the contrary, he

It was in the old Château of St. Loup, near the viage of Mesnil, on a sultry evening about the end of September, that a party was assembled, who, in point of rank and greatness of design, had seldom been equilieu within those walls, even when they were the babitation of the great and beautiful of other days. But years and centuries had passed aince they had been so tenanted. The courty and was full of weeds, and grass, and tangled shrubs : the iny creeping over the mined walls obtraded its long branches through the unglated windows, and the breaches which the seige of time had effected in the solid masonry gave entrance to the wind of night and the wintry tempest.

BICHELIES.

The chamber that hid been chosen for a place of meeting on the present occasion was one which, more than any other, had escaped the hand of desolation. The casements, it is true, had long ceased to boast of glass, and part of the wall itself had given way, encumbering with its broken fragments the farther end of the great saloon, as it had once been called. The rest, however, of the chamber was in very tolerable ropair, and contained also several pieces of furniture, consisting of more than one rude seat, and a large uncouth table, which evidently had never belonged to the castle in its days of splendour.

At the head of this table sat Gastan the Duke of Orleans, the younger brother of the king, leaning his head upon his hand in an attitude of listless indifference, and amusing himself by brushing the dust which had gathered on the board before him, into a thousand fanciful shapes with the feather of a pen—now forming fortifications with this and parallels, and half-moons and curtains—and then sweeping them all heedlessly away: offering no bad image of the many yast and intricate plans he had engaged in, all of which he had overthrown alike by his caprice and indecision.

Near him sat his two great favourites and advisers, Montressor and St. Ibal: the first of whom was really the inconsiderate fool he seemed; the second, though not without his share of folly, concealed deeper plans under his a sumed carelessness. These two men, whose pride was in during every thing, affected to consider nothing in the score worth trouble or attention, professing at the score time perfect indifference to danger and uncomform time perfect indifference of the score mere time perfect indifference and virtue were mere there and contending that vice and virtue were mere there are the signified any thing according to the philosophy; and Montressor lost no opportunity of evincing that heedlessness of every thing serious which formed the principal point of his doctrine. In the present instance he had produced a couple of dice from his pocket, and was busily engaged in. throwing with St. Ibal for some pieces of gold which lay between them.

RICHELIEU,

Two more completed the party assembled in the old Chêreau of St. Loop. The first of these was Cinq Mars : his quick and ardent spirit did not suffer him to join in the frivolous pastimes of the others, but on the contrary, he kept walking up and down the apartment, as if impatient for the arrival of some one expected by all; and every now and then, as he turned at the extremity of the chamber, he cast a glance upon the weak duke and his vicious computions, almost amounting to scora.

Beside the master of the horse, and keeping an equal pace, was the celebrated President De Thou, famous for unswerving integrity and the mild dignity of virtuous c urage. His personal appearance, however, corresponded ill with the excellence of his mind; and his plain features, ill-formed figure, and inelegant movements, contrasted strongly with the handsome countenance and princely gait of Cinq Mars, as well as the calm pensive expression of his downcast eye, with the wild and rapid glance of bis commanion's.

As the time wore away, the impatience of Cinq Mars visibly increased; and every two or three minutes he would stop, and look out f om one of the open casements, and then approaching the table would take one of the torches, of which there were several lighted in the room, and strike it against the wall to increase the flame. "It is very extraordinary." cried he at length, "that Fontrailles has not yet arrived."

"Oh! no. Cinq Mars." replied De Thou, "we are a full hour before the time. You were so impatient. my good friend, that you made us all set off Jong before it was necessary."

"Why, it is quite dark," said the moster of the horse, " and Fontrolles promised to be here at nine.--It is surely nine, is it not, Montressor ?"

"Size ace," said the gambler, "quatre à quatre, St. Ibal. I shall win yet."

" Pshaw !" cried Cinq Mars—" who will tell me the time ? I wish we could have clocks made small enough to put in our pockets."

"I will show you what will tell us the hour as well as if we had," answered De Thou. "Look out there in the west! Do you see what a red light the sun still casts upon those heavy masses of cloud that are coming up 7. Now the sun goes down at seven; so you may judge it can scarce be yet."

"Cinque quatre " cried Montressor, throwing. "I have lest, after all-Monsieur de Thou, will you bet me a thousand crow s that it is not past eight by the village clock of Mesnil St. Loup "."

"No, indeed !" replied the president ; " I nother wish to win your money, Monsieur Montressor, nor to lose my own. Nor do I see how such a bot could be determined."

"Oh! if you do not take the bet, there is no use of isquiring how it might be determined," rejoined Montressor. "Monseignetit," he continued, turning to the Duke of Orleans, who had just swept away his last fortification, and was laying out a flower-garden in its place; "can you tell how in the name of fortune these chairs and this table came here, when all the rest of the place is as empty as your highness's purse ?"

"Or as your head, Montressor," answered the duke. "But the truth is they were the property of poor of "Ere Le Rouge, who lived for many years in these ruins,-ball-knave, half-m dman,-till they tried and bornt him for a sore yer down in the word there at the foot of the hill. Since then it has down called the Sorcerer's Grove, and the country period are not found of massing through "L which has down are not found of massing through "L which has down are not found of massing through "L which has down are not found of massing through "L which has down beamt by firewood; for none of the old word the neighborhood dare come to fetch it, or infallibly it would undergo the same fate as its master."

"So, that wood is called the Sorcerer's Grove,'r said St. Ibal, laughing: "that is the reason yout highness brought us round the other way, is it not ?"

Gaston of Orleans coloured a good deal at a jest which touched too near one of his prevailing weakness; for no one was perstition eff, yet no one was more as ty. "No, no!" answered i Pere Le Rouge and his prophecter. great a mistake in my own case to any off to me since his predictions have proved false, I will answer for him." "Why, what did he predict about you, monseign-, eur?" asked De Thou, who knew the faith which the duke still placed in astrology.

"A great deal of nonsense," answered the duke, affecting a tone very foreign to his real feelings. "He predicted that I should marry the queen, after the death of Louis. Now, you see, I have married some one else, and therefore his prophecy was false. But however, as I said, these chairs belonged to him : where he got them I know not-perhaps from the devil; but at all events, I wish he were here to fill one now; he would be a good companion in our adventures." As he spoke, a bright flash of lightning blazed through the apartment, followed by a loud and rolling peal of thunder, which made the duke start, exclaining, Jesu! what a flash !?"

"Your highness thought it was Père Le Rouge," scidSt. Ibal; "but he would most likely come in at the door, if he did come; not through the window."

Gaston of Orleans heard the jests of his two companions without anger; and a moment or two after, Cinq Mars, who stood near one of the dilapidated casements, turned round, exclaiming, "Hark! I hear the sound of horse's feet: it is Fontrailles at last. Give me a torch; I will show him where we are."

er, I suppose it is the same to you which," "Oh, yes !" answered the dake, " be welcome. Nothing like keeping h As he spoke, Cinq Mars returned, by Fontrailles, both laughing with no What makes ye so merry, my fords? Montressor ; "a hugh is too good a t lost, Has Monsieur de Foutrailles et his old friend Sathanas by the riad-side, "Not so," answered Cing Mars, "he bamboozted an inkeeper. But come, F let us not lose time: will you read over the of alliance to which we are to put our hand let us determine upon them 'to-night, fo meet frequently in this way, we shall become pecteil ere cur design he ripe." "Willingly for my part, "replied Fontraille proaching the table, and speaking with of emphasis, but without immed to declamation. "T case when beast; are we not bound to consider him such, and to hunt him to the death for the general safefy ?"

De Thou shook his head, as if there was something in the proposition to which he could not subscribe; but Cinq Mars at once gave his unqualified assent, and all being scated round the table. Fontrailles drew forth some papers, and proceeded.

"This, then, is our first grand object," said he : "to deprive this tyrant, whose abase of power not only extends to oppress the subject, but who even darea, with most monstrous presumption, to curb and overrale the royal authority, making the monarch a mere slave to his will, and the monnerh's name but a shield behind which to shelter his own crimes and iniquities—I say, to deprive this usurping favourite of the means of draining the blood of France; thereby to free our king from bondage, to restors peace and tranquility to our country, and to bring back to our homes leng banished confidence, security, and ease—To this you all agree "

A general assent followed, and Fontrailles went on.

"Safely to effect our purpose, it is not only necessary to use every energy of our minds, but to exert all the local power we possess. Every member, therefore, of our association, will use all his influence with those who are attached to him by favour or connexion, and prepare all his vassals, troops, and retainers, to act in whatsoever manner shall hereafter be determined, and will also amass whatever sums he can procure for the general object. It will also be necessary to concentrate certain bodies of men on particular points, for the purpose of sensing on some strong forthied places. And farther, it will be advisable norrowly to watch the movements of the cardinal, in order to make ourselves masters of his person."

"But whose authority shall we have for this 10" emanded De Thou; "for while he continues prime minister by the king's consent, we are committing high treason to restrain his person."

BICHELIEU.

"We must not be so scrupplous, De Thou," rejoined Cinq Mars; "we must free his mijesty from those magic chains in which Richelieu has so long held bis mind, before we can expect him to do any thing openly: but I will take it upon me to procure his private assent. I have sounded his inclinations already, and am sure of my ground. But proceed, Fontrailles: let us hear what arrangements you have made respecting troops, for we must have some power to back us, or we shall fail."

"Well, then," said Fontrailles, "I bring with me the most generous offers from the noble Duke of Bouillon. They are addressed to you, Cinq Mars, but were sent open to me. I may as well, therefore, give their contents at once, and you can afterward peruse them at your leisure. The duke here offers to place his town and principality of Sedau in our hands, as a depot for arms and munition, and also as a place of retreat and safety, and a rendezvous for the assembling of forces. He farther promises, on the very first call, to march his victorious troops from Italy, when, as he says, every soldier will exult in the effort to liberate his country."

"Generously promised of the duke," exclaimed Montressor, slapping the table with mock enthusiasm. " My head to a bunch of Macon grapes, he expects to be prime minister in Richelieu's place,"

"The Duke of Bouillon, Monsieur de Montressor," replied Cinq Mars somewhat warmly, "has the good of his country at heart; and is too much a man of houor to harbour the ungenerous thought you would attribute to him."

"My dear Cinq Mars, do not be angry?" sold Montressor, "Don't you see how much the olds were in my favour? Why, I betted my head ton't banch of grapes, and who do you think would be fool enough to hazard a full bunch of grapes again an empty head? But go on, Fontrailles; who

" "From Spain?" auswered Fontrailles, calmly; while at the name of that country, at open war with France, and for years considered as its most dangerous enemy, each countenance round the table assumed a look of astonishment and disapprobation, which would probably have caunted any other than the bold conspirator who named it.

"No, no !" exclaimed Gaston of Orleans, as soon as he had recovered breach. "None of the Spanish Catholicon for me ?" alluding to the name which had been used to stigmatize the assistance that the League had received from Spain during the civil wars occasioned by the accession of Henry IV, to the throne. "No, no ! Monsieur de Fontrailles, this is high trenson at once."

St. Ibal was generally supposed, and with much appearance of truth, to have some secret counexion with the Spanish court ; and having now recovered from the first surprize into which he had been thrown by the bold mention of an alliance with that obnoxious country, he jested at the fears of the timid and unsteady duke, wall knowing that by such means he was easily governed. " Death to my soul !" exclaimed he -" Your highness calls out against high treasure, when it is what you have lived upon all your life ! Why, it is meat, drink, and clothing to you. A little treason is as necessary to your comfort as a dice-box is to Montressor, a Barbary horse to Cinq Mars, or a bird net and hawkingginve to the king. But, to spenk seriously, monseigneur," he continued, " is it not necessary that we should have some further support than that which Monaigur de Buillon promises / His cuthusiasm may have decrived him ;---his troops may not be half so well inclined to our cause as he s himself ; he might be taken ill ; he might either he arrested by the gout, to which he is subject, or by the cardinal, to whom we all wish he was not subject. A thousand causes might prevent his giving us the assistance he intends, and then what a useful auxiliary would Spain prove. Besides, we do er table bation ir than a soon panish which title titl	France. Spain to fight age only of the cardinal ; and the immoved, who for his sole into manoved, who for his sole into manover, and thus we shale to be and the nation. " We must not let his king to manower the field in the sole into the field the Duke of Odies into this that Louis will disar into the field the Duke of Odies into the same into the sole of manower into the sole of the sole of his sole into the sole of the sole of the sole of the sole of the sole of the sole into the sole of the sole of the sole into the sole of the sole of the sole into the sole of th

RICHELIEV.

than I had any idea of-Cing Mars, I was not in formed of all this-had I been so, I never would have come here. To serve my country, to rid her of a minister who, as I conceive, has nearly destroyed her, who has trampled France under his feet, and enthralled her in a blood-stained chain, I would to-morrow lay my head upon the block-Frown not, Monsieur de Fontrul es-Cinq Mars, my noble friend, do not look offended-but I cannot, I will not be a party to the crime into which mistaken zoal is hurrying you. Are we not subjects of France ? and is not France at war with Spain ? and though we may all wish and pray God that this war may cease, yet to treat or conspire with that hostile. kingdom is an act which makes us traitors to our country and rebels to our king. Old De Thou has but two things to lose-his life and his honour. His life is valueless. He would sacrifice it at once for the least benefit to his country. He would sucrifice it, Cinq Mars, for his friendship for you. But his honour must not be sullied ; and as through life he has knpt it unstained, so shall it go with him unstained to his last hour. Were it merely personal dauger you called upon me to undergo, I would not bestow a thought upon the risk : but my fame, my allegiance, my very salvation are concerned, and I will never give my snuction to a plan which begins by the treasonable proposal of bringing foreign enemies into the beart of the land."

"As to your salvation. Monsieur le President," anid Montressor, " I'll undertake to buy that for you for a hundred crowns. You shall have an indulgence to comout suns ad libitum, in which high treason shall be specified by name. Now, though these red-hut heretics of Germany, who seem inclimed to bring that fiery place upon earth, which his heliuess threatens them with in another world, and who are assisted by our Catholic cardinal with money, troops, annauntion, and all the hell-invent ed implements of war, -though these Protestants, I say, put no trust in the indulgencies which there apostacy has rendered cheap in the market, am sure you are by far too stanch a tickler f antique abuses to doubt their efficacy. I suptherefore, when salvation can be had for a hun crowns, good Monsieur de Thou, vou can hav scruple on that score-unless indeed you at stingy as the dog in the fable."

" Jests are so arguments; Monsieur de Monti

sor;" replied de Thou, with stern gravity; Inve a bad habit, young sir, of scotting at what w r men revere. Had you any religion yourself, any kind, or any reason for having none, we mig pardon your error, because it was founded on prin cipic. As for mysell, sir, what I believe, I believ from conviction; and what I do, I do with the first persussion that it is right; without endeavouring t choat a had cause write a show of spirit, or to hide my incapacity to defined it with state jokes and profane railery. Gentlemen, you act as you please ; for my part, I enter into no plan by which Spain is to be employed or treated with a "I think it diagerous too," said the unsteady Dukeof Odenne.

"Test times more dangerous to attempt any thing. without," exclormed Fontrailies, Should we not he foole to engage in such an euterprise without some foreign power to support us ? We might as well go to the Patars Cardinal, and offer our throats to Richelieu af once." Montressor and Sr. Ibyl both applied themselves in quiet the fears of the doke, and soon succeeded a removing from his mind any apprehens one of the core of Sprin : but he continued from time to time to look suspiciously at De From, who had risa from the table; and was again walkin; up and way the apactment. At length Gaston beckmed Cinq Mars, and whispered something to his ext. You do him wrong, my Lord," excla med Ching rs, indignantly, sel will answer for hi faith. De " he continued, " the duke asks your ;

and though I think my friend ought not to be suspected, I will be obliged by your giving it."

"Most assuredly," replied Be Thou ; " his highness need be under no alarm On my honour, in life or in death. I will never betray what I have head here. But that I may hear as little as possible. I will take one of these torches, and wait for you in the lower apartments."

"Take care that you do not meet with Pere Le Rouge, Monsieur de Thou," exclaimed St. Ibal as Do Thou left them.

"Cease your jesting, gentlemen," said Cinq Mars; "we have had too much of it already. A man with the good conscience of my friend De Thou, need not mind whom he meets. For my own part, I am resolved to go on with the business I have undertaken; I believe I am in the right; and if not; God forgive me, for my intentioos are good."

The rest of the plan was soon settled after the president had left the room; and the treaty which it was proposed to enter into with Spain was read through and approved. The last question which occurred, was the means of conveying a copy of this occurred, was the means of conveying a copy of this treaty to the court of King Philip, without taking the circuitous route by the Low Countries. Numerous difficulties presented themselves to every erous difficulties presented themselves to every plau that was suggreated, till Fontrailles, with an a ffectrium migreau modelly, proposed to be the hearer finandf, if as he said, they considered his abilities aqual to the task

The offer was of course gladly accepted, as he well know it would be : and now being to the extent of his wish furnished with unlimited powers, and poseessed of a document which put the lives of all his associates in his power. Fontrailles brought the conference to an end: it being agreed that the parties should not meet again till after his return from Spain.

A few minutes more were spent in seeking cloaks and hats, and extinguishing the torches; and thea descending to the court-yard, they mounted their horses, which had found shelter in the mine of the old castle, and set out on their various By this time the storm had cleared away, the air but the purcer and the more screne bright moon skining acar her meridian, a light Cinq Mars and De Thou on the way Paries while the Duke of Orleans and his putheir steps towards Bourbon, and Fontrall for Troyes to prepare for his journey to Sp

CHAPTER XVI

Intended to prove that keen subted politicians as zards after all, and to show how Philip the wood ride caller than usual.

I WISH to Heaven it were possible, story, to follow the old Greek's rule, and at least unity of place throughout. It won great deal of trouble, both to write - and we could make all our characters come hall, say they say, and have done with it. is only one place where they could be sur meet-bernes and heroines, statesmen and tors, servant and master, promi and hum true Procrustes' bed which is unde to fit e However, as before I could get them th story would be done, and the generation away, I must even violate all the unities a d gallop after my characters all over the as I have alten seen a shepherd in the l France, striding have and there upon his I after his williel and stranghing sheep, and ing is van to keep them all together. the reader. therefore, to get into the

me, and set off for chantilly; and as we go, I will tell him a few anecdotes just to pass the time.

It was a common custom with Louis the Thirteenth to spend a part of the morning in that large circular piece of ground at Chantilly, called then, as now, the manege; while his various hunters, in which he took great delight, were exercised before Here, while the few gentlemen that generalhim. ly accompanied him, stood a step behind, he would lean against one of the pillars that surrounded the place, and remark, with the most minute exactitude, every horse as it passed him, expressing his approbation to the grooms when any thing gave him satisfaction. But on the same morning which had witnessed at St. Germain the arrest of De Blenau, something had gone wrong with the king at Chantilly. He was impatient, cross, and implacable : and Lord Montague, an English nobleman, who was at that time much about him, remarked in a low voice to one of the geotlemen in waiting, "His majesty is as peevish as a crossed child, when Cing Mars is absent."

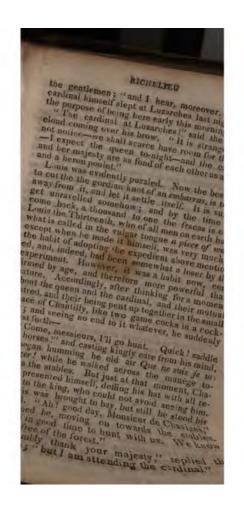

The name of his grand ecuyer, though spoken very low, caught the king's ear.

"Do my of youknow when Cinq Marsteturns ?" demanded he. "We never proceed well when he is not here.—Lock at that man now, how he tides," continued Louis, pointing to one of the grooms ; "would not any one take him for a monkey on horseback? Do you know where Cinq Mars is gone, M Lor?"

" I hear, sire," replied Lord Montague," that he is gone with Monsieur de Thou to Troyes, where he has an estate, about which there is some dispute, which Monsieur de Thou, who is learned in such matters, is to determine."

"To Troyes!" exclaimed the king, "that is a journey of three days—Did not some of youtell me, that Chavigni arrived, last night, while i was junting 1%.

I did no, please your majesty," replied can et

RICHELIET.

"And why not attend the king, sir 7 Ha!" exclaimed Louis, his brow gathering into a heavy frown. "It is our will that you attend us, sir."

Chavigni did not often commit such blunders, but it was not very casy to remember at all times to pay those external marks of respect which generally attend real power, to a person who had weakly resigned his authority into the hands of another : and as the cardinal not only possessed kingly sway, but maintained kingly state, it sometimes happened that the king himself was treated with scanty ceremony. This, however, always irritated Louis not a little. He cared not for the splendour of a throne, he cared not even for the luxuries of royalty; but of the personal reverence due to his station, he would not bate an jota, and clung to the shadow when he had let the substance pass away. The statesman now hastened to repair his error, and howing profoundly, he replied, " Had I not thought that in serving the cardinal I best served your majesty, I should not have ventured on so bold an answer; but as your majesty is good enough to consider my pleasure in the chase, and the still greater pleasure of accompanying you, your invitation will be more than excuse for breaking my appointment with the cardinal."

To bear the burthen of forcing one of the council to break his engagement with the prime minister, and all for so triffing a cause as an accidental hunting party, was not in the least what the king wished or intended, and he would very willingly hava excused Chavign's attendance ; but Chavigni would not be excused.

The willy statesman well know, that Richelieu had that day a point to corry with the king of the deepest importance as to the stability of his power. The queen, whom the cardinal had long kept in complets depression, being now the mother of two princes, her influence was increasing in the comtry to a degree that alarmed the minister for his own sway. It was a principlo with Richelieu always to meet an evil in its birth; and seeing plainly that as the king's health declined-and it was then failing fast-the party of Anne of Austria. would increase, if he did not take strong measures to annihilate it-he resolved at once to run her with her husband, to deprive her of her children, and, if nossible even to send her back to Spain. "And then." thought he, " after the king's death I shall be regent .- Regent ? King ! ay, and one more despatic than ever sat upon the throne of France. For twenty years this young daughta must be under my guidance; and it will be strange indeed if I cannot keep him there till my sand be run." And the proud man who reasoned thus, knew not that even then he trembled on the verge of the grave.

" Ainsi, dissipateurs peu sages Des rapides bientsits du temps, Nos desirs embrasient des ages, Et nons n'evons que des instans."

However, the object of his present visit to Chantilly was to complete the run of the queen; and Chavigni, who suffered his eyes to be blinded to simple right and wrong by the maxims of state policy, lent himself entirely to the cardinal's measure's, little imagining that personal harred had any share in the motives of the great minister whose steps he followed.

À moment's reflection convinced Chavigni that he might greatly promote the object in view by necompanying the king in the present instance. He knew that in difficult enterprises the most triffing circumstances may be turned to advantage; and he considered it a great thing gained at that moment, to lay Louis under the necessity of offering some amends, even for the apparent triffe of making him, break his appointment with Richelieu. In visitong with the king, he would have an opportunity of noting the monarch's state of mind, which he prepaing the way for those impressions which Richelie intended to give : and accordingly he avoided we consummate art any subject which an ignt open way for Louis to withdraw his previous order to accompany him.

214

Having already followed one royal hunt somewhat too minutely, we will not attempt to trace the presert; only observing that during the course of the day, Chavigni had many opportunities of conversing with the king, and took care to inform him that the campaigu in the Netherlands was showing itself much against the arms of France; that no plan was formed by the government, which did not by some " means reach the cars of the Spanish generals, and consequently that all the manmuvres of the French troops were unavailing; and from this; as a natural deduction, he inferred, that some one at the court of France must convey information to the enemy ; mingling these pleasant matters of discourse, with sundry sage observations respecting the inquity and baseness of thus betraying France to her enemies,

Lonis was exactly in the homour flat the statesmin could have wished. Peevish from the absence of Cinq Mars, and annoyed by the unexpected coming of Richeliou, he listened with indignation to all that Chavigni told him, of any one in France conveying intelligence to a country which he hated with the bliadest antipathy.

The predominant passion in the king's mind had long been his dislike to Spain, but more especially to Piulip, whom he regarded as a personal enemy : and Chavigni easily discerned by the way in which the nows he conveyed was received, that if they could cast any probable suspicion on the queen (and Chavigni really believed her guilty.) Louis would so to bounds to his anger. But just at the moment he was congratulating himself upon the probable ancess of their schemes, a part of the storm he had been so basily raising. fell unexpectedls upon himself.

"Well, Monsieu- da Chavigni," said the king, after the chase was over, and the royal party were riding slowly back towards Chantilly," this hunting a right noble sport : think you not so, sir ?"

The matter was now beyond a doubt, and Chavigni replied boidly, "Your majesty is pieased to speak in riddles, which I am reatly at a loss to compresend."

"Well, well, sir," said Louis, hastily, " it shall be inquired into, and made plain both to you and me. Any thing that is done legally must not be too strictly noticed; but I will not see the laws by kan, and muster altempted, even to serve state purposes."

Thus speaking, the king put his horse into a quicker pace, and Chavigni followed with his prind not a little discomposed, though his conntenance offered not the slightest truce of embarrasment. How he was to act, now became the question ; and running over in his own mind all the circumstauces connected with the attack upon the Count de Blennu, he could see no other nexus by which Louis could have become acquainted with his participation therein, then by the loquacity of Philip, the woodman of Mantes ; and as he came to this conclusion, Chavigni internally cursed that confident security which had made him reject the advice of Latemas, when the sharp-witted judge had counselled him to arrest Philip on first discovering that he had remarked the livery of Isabel and silver among the robbers,

In the present instance, the irritable and unusually decided humour of the king, made him lear that impuiries might be instituted immediately, which would not only be dangerous to himself personally, but might probably overthrow all those plans which he had been labouring, in conjunction with the cardinal, to bring to perfection. Calculating rapidly, therefore, all the consequences which might enane. Chavigni resolved at once to have the woodman placed in such a situation as to prevent hum from giving any farther evidence of what he Inil SPER. But far from showing any untimely hastn, though he was the first to dismount in the court-yard to offer the king his aid in alighting, yet that ceremony performed, he loitered patting his horse's neck, and giving trifling directions to his groom, till such time as Louis had entered the palace, and his figure had entered the palace, and his figure had been seen passing the window at the top of the staircase. That moment, however, Chaving i dared into the clatteau and seeking his own apartments, he wrote an order for the arrest of Philip the woodman, which with the some despitch he placed in the hands of two of his most devoted creatures, adding a hillet to the governor of the Bastille, in which he begged him to treat the prisoner with all kindness, and allow him all sorts of liberty within the prison, but on no account to let him escape till he received notice from hem.

We have a ready had occasion to see that Chavigni was a mm who considered state policy paramount to every other principle; and naturally not of an ungen le disposition or ignoble spirit he had unfortunately been educated in a belief that nothing which was expedient for the statesman could be discreditable to the min. However, the origin al bent of his mind generall showed itself in some degree, even in his most unjustifiable actions as the ground-work of a tildure will still shine through, and give a colour to whatever is painted above it. In the present instance, as his only object was to keep the woodman out of the way till such time as the king's unwouled mood had passed by he gave the strictest commands to those who bore the order for Philip's arrest, to use him with all possible centleness, and to assure his wife and family that no harm was intended to him. He also sent him a purse, to provide for his comfort in the prison, which he well knew could not be procured without the potent aid of gold.

The two attendions, accustomed to execute cemmands which required despatch, set out instantly on their journey, proceeding with all speed to Benumont, and thence to Pontoise, where cross ing the river Orac they soon after arrived at Mer-lan; and here a dispute arose concerning the necessity of calling upon two exempts of that city to aid in arresting Philip the woodman, the one servant arguing that they had no such orders from their lord, and the other replying that the said Philip might have twenty companions for aught they knew, who might resist their authority, they not being legally entitled to arrest his majesty's lieges. This argument was too conclusive to be refuted; and they therefore waited at Meulan till the two exempts were ready to accompany them. It being night when they arrived at Moulan, and the two exempts being engaged in "potations deep and strong," drinking long life to the Cardinal de Richelieu, and success to the royal prisons of France, some time was of course speat before the party could proceed. However, alter the lapse of about an hour, discussed no matter how, they all contrived to get into their saddles, and passing the bridge over the Seine, soon reached the first little village, whose white houses, conspicuous in the moonlight, seemed, on the dark back ground of the forest as if they had creat for protection into the very hosom of the wood ; while it, sweeping round them on every side, appeared in its turn to afford them the friendly shelter that they sought.

RICHELLEU.

All was silence as they passed through the village, announcing plainly that its sober inhabitants were comfortably dozing away the darkness. This precaladed them from asking their way to Philip's dwelling; but Chavigni had been so precise in his direction, that notwithstanding the wine pots of Mealan, the two servants, in about half an hour after having entered the wood, recognised the abreueoir and coltage, with the long-felled oak and piece of broken ground, and all the other et cetera which entered into the description they had received.

There is nothing half so amusing as the bustle with which little people carry on the triffes that are intrusted to them. They are so important, and so active, one would think that the world's turning round upon its axis depended upon them; while all the mighty business of the universe alips by as quietly as if the wheels were oiled; and the government of a nation is often decided over a cup of eolie, or the fate of empires changed by an extra bottle of Johanisberg.

But to return. Chavigni's two servants, with the two exempts of Meulan, were as important and as busy as emmets when their hill is disturbed-or a sous-secretarie when he opens his first despatch, and receives information of a revolution in the Isle of Man-or the fleas in an Italian bed, when you suddenly light your candle to see what the devil is biting you so infernally-or the devil himself in a gale of wind-or any other little person in a great florry about nothing. So having discovered the cottage, they held a profound council before the door, disputing vehemently as to the mode of proceeding. One of the exempts proposed to knock at the door, and then suddenly to seize their prisoner as he came to it ; but Chavigni's servants, though somewhat dipped in the Lethean flood in which the exempts of Moulan had seduced them to bathe, remembered the strict orders of their master, to treat Philip with all possible gentleness, and judging that the mode proposed might startle him, and affect his nerves, they decided against the motion.

A variety of other propositions were submitted, and rejected by the majority, each one liking nubody's suggestion but his own; till one of the exempts, not bearing clearly in mind the subject of discussion, knocked violently at the dour, declaring it was tiresome to stand disputing on their (eet, and that they could settle how they should gain admission after they had got in and sat down.

This seemed a very good motion, and settled the matter at once; and Philip, who was in that sound, and learless sleep which innocence, content, and labour can alone bestow, not exactly answering first, they all repeated the noise, not a hube raged at his want of attention to personages of such high merit as themselves.

220

The moment after, the woodman appeared at the window, and seeing some traveliers, as he imagined, he bade them want till he had lighted a lamp, and he would come to them. Accordingly, in a moment or two Philip opened the door, putposing either to give them shelter, or to direct them on their way, as they might requiree but when the hight gleamed upon the black dresses of the exempts, and then mon the well-known colours of tashed and shere the woodman's heart as k, and his check turned pale, and he had scarcely power to demand their errand.

"I will tell you all that presently," replied the principal servant of the two, who, like many another small man in many another place, thought to become great by much speaking. "First let us come in and rest ourselves; for as you may judge by our dusty doublets, we have radien far and hard; and after that I will expound to you, good friend the cause of our coming, with soundy other currous particulars, which may both entertain and affect you."

Puilip suffered them to enter the house, oneafter another, and setting down the lamp, he gazed upon them in silence, his horor at gentlemen in black coats and long straight swords, as well as those dressed in table1 and silver, being quite unspeakable.

"Well, Monsieur Philip le Bucheron," suid the spokesmann, throwing himself into the caken actule with that sort of percussion of breath denoting fatigue: "you seem frightened, Monsieur Philip; but, good Monsieur Philip, you have no cause for fear. We are all your friends, Monsieur Philip."

"I am plad to hear, sir," replied the woodcutter; "but may I know what you want with me ?"

"Why, this is the truth, Monsieur Philip," To-

RICHELIEG.

plied the servant, " it seems that his majesty the king, whom we have just left at Chaitilly, is very angry about something,-Lord knows what! and our noble employer, not to suy master the Count de Chavigni, having once upon a time received some courtesy at your hands, is concerned for your safety, and has therefore deemod it necessary that you should be kept out of the way for a time?"

"Oh, if that be the case," cried Philip, rubbing his hands with gladness, "though I know not why the king's anger should fall on me, I will take myself out of the way directly."

"No, no. Monsieur Philip, that won't do exactly," answered the servant. "You do not know how fond my master is of you; and so concerned is he for your safety, that he must be always sure of it, and therefore has given us command to let you stay in the Bastille for a few drs."

At that one word Bastille, Philip's imagination set to work, and instantly conjured up the image of a huge tower of red copper, somewhat modify, standing on the top of a high mountain, and guarded by seven huge giants with hut one eye apince, and the like number of hiery dragons with more teeth and claws than would have served a dozen. If it was not exactly this, it was something very like it; for Philip, whose travels had never extended a league beyond the wood of Mantes, knew as much about the Bastille as Saint Augustin did of Heaven,—so both draw from their own fancy for what of better miternals.

However, the purse which Chavigne's attendants gave him in behalf of their master, for they dored not withhold his bounty, however much they might be inclined, greatly allayed the fears of the woodman.

There is sumething wonderfully consciously to the chink of gold at all threes post in the oresent instance, Philip drew from it the constructive conclusion, that they could not mean him any green harm when they sent him money. "I know not what to think," cried he.

"Why, think it is exactly as I tell you," replied the servant, " and that the count means you well. But after you have thought as much as you like, get ready to come with us, for we have no time to spare."

This was the worst part of the whole business. Philip had now to take leave of his good dame Joan, which, like a well-arranged sermon, consisted of three distinct parts; he had first to wake her, then to make her compehend, and then to endure her immentation.

The first two were tasks of some difficulty, for Joan slept tolerably well-that is to say, you might have fired a cannon at her ear without making her hear-and when she was awake, her understanding did not become particularly pellucid for at least an hour after. This on ordinary occasions-but on the present Philip laboured hard to make her mind take in that he was arrested and going to the Bastille. But finding that her sense were still somewhat obdurate, and that she did nothing but rub her eyes, and stretch and yawn in his face, he had recourse to the same means morally, which he would have used physically to cleave an oak ; namely, he kept shouting to her, "Bastille ? Bastille ! Bastille !" reiterating the word upon her ear, just in the same manner that he would have plied the timber with his ase.

At length the comprehended it all. Her ove glanced from the inner room upon the unworted guests who occupied the other chamber, and then to the dismayed counternance of her hisband; and divining it subdenly, she threw her arms round the athletic form of the woodman, bursting into a passion of tears, and declaring that he should not leave her.

Of course, on all such occasions there must follow a very tender scene between husband and wife, and such there was in the present instance :

and silver, but poured fort nation upon all alike. However, as all things must come so did this; and Philip was catried the vain entreaties his wife at length c ed to use. The only difficulty which remained to mount their prisoner, having all bring a horse from Meulan for that pur Philip, not choosing to facilitate his ow al by telling them that he had a mu However it was at length agreed, that the exempts should walk to the next to that Philip should mount his horse till could be obtained. As the party turne from the hut, the chief servant, somewhat by the unceasing tears of Jonn, touk up to say that he was sure that Charles the man's son, who stood with his mother door, would be permitted to zee his father Bastille, in they would all agree to say did not know what-was any impertir

Bastille, and Philip, who was now excessively tired, never lawing ridden half the way in his life, was getually glad to arrive at the prison, which he had previously contemplated with so much horror.

Here he was delivered, with the latter de catchet, and Chavigni's note, to the governor; and the servantagain, in his own hearing, recommended that he should be treated with all imaginable kindness, and allowed every liberty consistent with his safe custode.

All this convinced the woolcutter, as well as the conversation he had heard on the road, that Chargemicrally meant well by bin ; and without any of these more relined feelings, which, however they may sometimes open the gates of the heart to the purset joys, but too often betray tha fortness of the breast to the direct pans, he now felt comparatiesly scener, and gave up at the massy walls and towers of the Bastille with awe indeed, but awe not unmingled with admiration.

CHAPTER XVII.

Which shows that diadems are not without their thorm.

Trus shall be a short chapter I am determined ; because It is one of the most important in the whole work.

During the absence of the king and University in the chose. Two arrivals had taken place at Convolurepr dearly at the same moment. Luckity, her arrivathe queen hadjust time to alight from her carning and seek her apartments before the Cardinal of Richeliev entered the cou interview with her deadly hold-an interview from wi drawn an inauspicious au charge of superstition. As soon as Chavigni had vided for his own safety by de Philip's arrest, he proceeded Richelieu, and there he gave account of all he had hear is commenting particularly upon t ble mood of the king, and the might be thence derived, i the ger in the direction that they wi In the mean while Louis prociments of the queen- not indeed great affection for his wife, but his children, whom he sincerely standing the unaccountable manne frequently absented himself from t Never very attentive to dress, teenth, when any thing disturbed a reglected entirely the ordinary, care a the present instance he made no spare, although the sports in which gaged had not left it in a very lit at wing-room. Thus, in a pair of in ats, this hat pressed down upon his b ple dress soiled, deranged, and co , he presented himself in the saloon ustria sat surrounded by the young adies who had accompanied her to e queen immediately rose to receiv and advanced towards him with an daess, mixed, however, with some ension; for to her eyes, long acce the various changes of his temp his apparel plainly indicated th lated her but coldly, and with off his hat. "I am glad to see you well, madam," said he, and passed on to the nurse who held in her arms the young dauphin.

BIOHELIEU

The child had not seen its father forsome weeks, and now perceiving a rude looking. ill dressed man approaching hastily towards it, became frightened, hid its face on the nurse's shoulder, and burst into tears.

The rage of the king now broke the bounds of common decency.

"Ha!" exclaimed he, stamping on the ground with his heavy boot, till the whole spartment rang; "is it so, madam ? Do you teach my children also to dislike their lather ?"

"No; my lord, no, indeed !" replied Anne of Austria, in a tone of deep distress, seeing this unfortunate contrelems so strangely misconstrued to her disadvantage. "I mentior teach the child to dislike you, nor does he dislike you; but you approached Louis hastily, and with your hat thapped over your eyes, to that he does not know yon. Come hither, Louis," she continued, taking the dauphin out of the nurse's arms. "It is your father; do not you know him ? Have I not always told you to love him ?"

The dauphin looked at his mother, and then at the king ; and perfectly old enough to comprehend what she said, he began to recognise his father, and held out his little arms towards him. But Louis turned angely away.

"A fine lesson of dissimulation !" he exclaimed ; and advanced towards his second son, who then bore the title of Duke of Anjou. "All, my little Philip," he continued, as the infart received him with a placid smile; "you are not old enough to have learned any of these arts. You can love your father without being told to show it, like an ape at a puppet-show."

At this new attack the queen burst into tears.

"Indeed, indeed, my lord," she said, " you wrong me. On, Louis ! how you might have made use love you once?" and her tears redoubled thought of the past. "But I am a weak fool continued, wiping the drops from her eyes feel so sensibly what I do not deserve; at p your majesty does me deep injustice. I his ways taught both my children to love and r their futh.r. That name is the first word the learn to pronounce; and from me they le pronounce it with affection. But oh, my what will these dear children think in after when they see their father behave to their a as your majesty does towards me?" *

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the king, "let us ha more of all this. I hate these scenes of alter. Fear not, madam; the time will come when children will learn to appreciate us both the ly."

"I hope not, my lord." replied the quee vently; "I hope not. From me, at least, the never learn all I have to complain of in thei er."

Had Anne of Austria reflected, she would been silent; but it is cometimes difficult to a when urged by taunts and unmerited rop That excellent vial of water which the fastowed upon the unhappy wife is not alw hand to impede the utterance of rejoinders, like rejoinders in the court of chancery, only to urge on the strife a degree further, whethe be right or wrong. In the present case the pale countenance flushed with anger. "Bmadam, beware!" exclaimed he, "You ha ready been treated with too much lenity : re ber the affair of Chalais !"

"Well, sir!" replied the queen, raising he with an air of dignity, "your majesty know feels, and has said that. I am perfectly guilt that miserable plot. My lord, my lord! if y lay your head upon your pillow conscious of cence like mine, you will alcep well; my'l least is clear."

" See that it be, madam," replied Louis, darting upon her one of those fiery and terrible glances in which the whole vindictive soul of his Italian mother blazed forth in his eyes with the plare of a basillisk. "See that it be, madam ; for there may come worse charg s than that against you. I have learned from a sure source that a Spaniard is seeking my overthrow, and a women in of ing my ruin," he continued, repeating the i of the astrologer ; " that a prince is destruction, and a queen is betra see that your bosing quickly by her, om be clear. n he left the apt. loud enough for all within it to . s his eminence of Richelica ? Some was bus him notice that the king desires his presence when he has leisure."

Anne of Austria clasped her hands in silence, and looked up to heaven seemed for a moment to petition for support ander the new afflictions she saw ready to fall upon her, and then without a comment on the painful scene that had just passed, returned to her ordinary employments.

ł

CHAPTER XVIII.

Containing a great many things not more curious and laterest ing than true.

Is the old Château of Chantilly was a long gallery, which went by the name of the Cours aux cerfs, from the number of stags' heads which appeared currously sculptured upon the frieze, with their long branching horns projecting from the wal, and so far extended on both sides as to cross each other and form an extraordinary sort of trellis-work architrave before they reached the ceiung. The windows of this gallery were far spart and narrow, admitting but little light into the interior, which, being of a diagy stone colour, could hardly have been rendered cheerful, even by the brightest sunshine; but which, both from the smallness of the windows and the projection of a high lower on the other side of the court, was kept in continual shadow, except when in the longest days of summer the sun just passed the angle of the opposite holding and threw a parting gleam through the last window, withdrawn as quickly as bestowed.

RICHELIES.

But at the time I speak - f, namely, two days after the queen's arrival at Chantilly, no such cheering ray found entrance. It seemed, indeed, a fit place for melancholy imaginings; and to such and purpose had hene of Austria applied it. For some time she had been standing at one of the windows, learning on the arm of Modeme de Beaumont, and silently gazing with abstracted thoughts upon the open casements of the corridor on the other side, when the figures of Richelieu and Chavigni, passing by one of them, in their full robes, canght her eye; and withshe was placed, she remarked to the marchioness what she had seen, and observed that they must be going to the concil-chamber.

Thus began a conversation which soon turned to the king and to his strange conduct, which ever since their arrival had continued in an increasing strain of petulance and ill-temper.

⁴ Indeed, madam," said the Marchioness de Beaumont, "your majesty's gentleness is misapplied. Far be it frem me to urge aught against my king ; but there be some dispositions which require to have their vehemence checked and repelled; and it is well also for themselves when they meet with one who will oppose them firmly and toleds."

"Perhaps, De Besumont," replied the que es, " If I had taken that course many years ago, it might have produced a happy effect; but now, also would be in vain; and God knows whether it work have succeeded even then !"

Birl spoke, on all ordinary occasions so calm and imperturbable, showed the queen how deeply her beart had taken part in that to which she alluded i of perhaps female curiosity might have led has to

ing her hands, and murmuring to herself the name of a higher and holier king, "yes! yes! I could have resisted !! The unusual energy with which the beautiful

The eloquent blood sprend suddenly over the beautiful countenance of the lady of honour. "Spare me, spare me, your majeste," cried she, kissing the hand the queen held out to her. "I thought that secret had been hidden in my bosom alone. But oh, let me hope that, even had it not been for my love for your majesty, I could still bave resisted. Yes! yes!" continued she. clasp-to you now of what I never spoke before. I know how much I have to thank you for-I know how much you have rejected for my sake-the love of a king would have found few to refuse it. You have done so for my sake, and you will have your re-

royal mistress, in so kind and gentle a manner that the tears rose in the eyes of Anne of Austria. "De Hauteford!" said she, "I feel a presentiment that we shall soon part, and therefore I speak

Mademoiselle de Hauteford instantly came at th queen's command, and approaching her with a swee and placid smile, said a few words of comfort to her

Anne of Austria turned to Madame de Besum with a look of m______ foreboding. " Mc more, more still to endure," she said : and th added, addressing the officer, " His majesty's co. mands shall be instantly obeyed ; so inform him, s De Beaumont, tell Mudemoiseile de Hauteford th I shall be glad of her assistance too. You will g

As she spoke, the door of the gallery opened an officer of the council appeared, notifying queen that his majesty the kirg demanded her]

230

RICHELIEU.

RICHELIER.

prolong the thems, though a painful one to both parties, had not the summons of the king required her immediate attention.

 As they approached the council chamber, Madame de Beaumont observed that the queen's steps wavered.

"Take courage, madam," said she. "For Heaven's sake, call up spirit to carry you through, whatever may occur."

"Fear not, De Beaumont," replied the queen, though her tone betrayed the approhension she felt.

"They shall see that they cannot frighten me." At that moment the huissier threw open the door of the council-chamber, and the queen with her ladies entered, and found themselves in the presence of he king and all his principal ministers. In the centre of the room, strewed with various papers and materials for writing, stood a long table, at the top of which, in a seat slightly raised above the rest. sat Louis himself, dressed as was usual with him, in a suit of black silk, without any ornament whatever, except three rows of sugar-loaf buttons of polished jet,-if these could be considered as ornamental. His hat, indeed, which he continued to wear, was looped up with a small string of jewels 4 and the feather, which fell much on one side, was buttoned with a diamond of some value ; but these were the only indications by which his apparel could have been distinguished from that of some poor avoité, or greffier de la cour.

On the right-hand of the king was placed the Cardinal de Richelieu, in his robe ; and on the left, was the Chancettor Seguier. Bouthilliers, Chavigni, Mazam, and other members of the council, filled the rest of the scats around the table ; but at the farther end was a vacant space, in front of which the queen now presented herself, facing two chart of the kinz.

There was an angry spot on Louis's brow, and Anne of Austria entered, he continued playing the he hill of his surface the south of the start of his start of his towards her. The queen's heart sank, but still she bore an undismayed countenance, while the cardinal fixed upon her the full glance of his dark commanding eyes, and rising from his seat, slightly inclined his head at her approach. The rest of the council rose, and Chavigni turned away his eyes, with an ill-defined sensation of pain and regret; but the more subtle Mazarin, ever watchful to court good opinion, whether for present or for fature purposes, glided quietly round, and placed a chair for her at the table. It was an ac-A moment's pause ensued. As soon as the queen was seated, Richelieu glanced his eye towards the countenance of the king, as if to instigate him to open the business of the day : but Louis's attention was deeply engaged in his sword-not, or at least seemed to be so, and the cardinal was at length forced to proceed himself. "Your majesty's presence has been desired by the king, who is like a God injustice and in equity b mid Richelieu, proceeding in that bold and figuarative style, in which all his public addresses were conceived, "in order to enable you to cast off, like a raiment that has been soiled by a foul touch, the accusations which have been secretly made against you, and to explain some part of your conduct, which, as clouds between the earth and the sun, have come between yourself and your royal husband, intercepting the beams of his princely approbation. All-this your majesty can doubtless do, and the king has permitted the council to hear your exculpation from your own lipe, that we may trample under our feet the foul suspicions that appear

BICHELLEV.

"Lord Cardinal," replied the queen, calmly but rmly, "I wonder at the boldness of your language. emember, sir, whom it is that you thus presume address-the wife of your sovereign, sir, who sits bound to protect her from insult and from in-

"Cease, cease, madam !" cried Louis, breaking silence. "First prove yourself innocent, and then use the high tone of innocence, if you will."

"To you, my lord," replied the queen, "I am ready to answor every thing, truly and faithfully as a good wile, and a good subject; but not to that audacious vassal, who, in oppressing and insulting me, but degrades your authority and weakens your power."

"Spare your invectives, madam," said the cardinal, calmly, "for, if I be not much mistaken, before you leave this chamber, you will be obliged to acknowledge all that is contained in the paper before you; in which case, the bad opinion of your majesty would be as the roar of idle wind, that hurteth not the mariner on shore."

"My lord and sovereign," said the queen, addressing Louis, without deigning to notice the cardinal, "it seems that some evil is laid to my charge; will you condescend to inform me of what crime I am accused that now calls your majesty's anger upon me? If loving you too well,---if lamenting your frequent absence from me,---if giving my whole time and care to your children, be no crimes, tell me my lord, tell me what I have done."

"What you have done, madam, is easily told," exclaimed Louis, his eyes flashing fire. "Give me that paper, Lord Cardinal; and passing hastily from article to article of its contents, he continued: "Have you not, contrary to my express command, and the command of the council, corresponded with Philip of Spain ? Have you not played the spy upon the plans of my government, and caused the defeat of my armies in Flanders, the losses of the Protestants in Germany, the failure of all our schemes in Halv, by the information you have comrecel ? Have you not written to Don Franciscondes Mello, and your cousin the archdoke ? Have you

"Never, never !" exclaimed the queen, class

"What !" cried Louis, dashing the paper angrily upon the table. " Darest thou deny what is as evident as the sun in the noonday sky ? Remember, madam, that your minion, De Blenau, is in the Bastille, and will soon forfeit his life upon the scaffold, if his obstinacy does not make him die under the ouestion."

"For poor De Blenan's entre, my lord," replied the queen .- " for the cent a ipar tell you Spainme. my me? E to menti. affairs of thi_ ____ no le, and as innom of tyranny, I will written to Philip of And who can blame has always loved lier than ever once s sume I knew of the public and far less, your majesty,

did I pry into sector prans of state policy for the purpose of divulging them. My letters, my lord, were wholly domestic. I spoke of myself, of my husband, of my children; I spoke as a woman, a wife, and a mother ; but never, my lord, as a queen ; and never, never as a spy.

"As to De Blenau, my lord, let me assure you, that before he undertook to forward those letters. he exacted from me a promise, that they should never contain any thing which could impeach his honour or his loyalty. This, y lord, is all my ecime, and this is the extent of his."

There was a degree of simplicity and truth in the manner of the queen which operated strongly on the mind of Louis. "But who,' suid he, "will youch that those letters contained nothing treasonable ? We have but your word, madam; and you well know that we are at war with Spain, and cannot procure a sight of the originals."

" Lucki'v," replied Anne of Austria, her countenance brightening with a ray of hope, " they have all been read by one whom your my sty yourself recommended to my friendship. Clara de Haulefords. you have seen them all. Speak! Tell the king hind the gueen's chair; and the kin omoiselle de Haut-ford advar generally believed, had once passional bot had met with no return, now fixed tentle upon the pale, beautiful creature ly like a being of the earth, glided sile and placed herself directly opposite to de Hauteford was devotedly attached to Whether it sprang from that sense of dui general governed all her actions, or who personal attachment, matters little, as was the same, and she would at no time eidered her life too great a sacrifice to the She advanced then before the council, that the happiness, if not the life of Anne tria, might depend upon ber answer; and her snowy hands together, she raised her a wards heaven, "So help me God at my need , she said, with a clear, slow, energetic ance, . no line that I have ever seen of her ; by's writing-and I believe I have the has written within the hat I have tation in the present instance, knowing that Loois's superstitions belief in the predictions of the astrologer had placed the monarch's mind completely under his dominion. "Mademoiselle de Hauteford," said he, in a stern voice, "answer me. Have you seen all the letters that the queen has written to her brother Philip King of Spain, positively knowing them to be such ?"

"So please your eminence, I have," replied Mademoiselle de Hauteford.

"Well then," said Richelieu, rising haughtily from his chair while he spoke, " in so doing you have committed misprision of treason, and are therefore banished from this court ard kingdom for ever: and if within sixteen days from this present you have not removed yourself from the precincts of the realm, you shall be considered guilty of high treason, and arraigned as such, masmuch as, according to your own confession, you have knowingly and wilfolly, after a decree in council against it, concealed and abetted a correspondence between persons within the kingdom of France, and a power declaredly its enemy."

As the cardinal uttered his sentence in a firm, deep. commanding voice, the king, who had at first listened to him with a look of surprise, and perhaps of anger, soon began to feel the habitual superiority of Richelieu, and shrunk back into himself, depressed and overawed : the queen pressed her hand before her eyes; and Chavigni balf-roised himself, as if to speak, but instantly resumed his seat as his eye met that of the cardinal.

It was Mademoiselle de Hauteford alone that heard her condemnation without apparent emotion. She merely howed her head with a look of the most perfect resignation. "Your emicence's will shall be obeyed," she replied, wand may a garious God protect my innocent mistress !!" Thus raying, she again took her place beloind the queen's chair, with bardly a change of countenance—always pale, perhaps her face was a little paler, but it was scarcely perceptible.

LICHELIEG.

"And now," continued Richelieu, in the same proud manner, assuming at once that power which he in reality possessed,—" and now let us proceed to the original matter, from which we have been diverted to sweep away a butterfly. Your majesty contesses yourself guilty of treason, in corresponding with the enemies of the kingdom. I hold in my hand a paper to that effect, or something very similar, all drawn from irrefragable evidence upon the subject. This you may as well sign, and on that condition no further notice shall be taken of the affair; but the matter shall be forgotten as an error in judgment."

"I have not confessed myself guilty of treason, arrogant prelate," replied the queen, " and I have not corresponded with Philip of Spain as an enemy of France, but as my own brother. Nor will I, while I have life, sign a paper so filled with falsehoods as any one must be that comes from your hand."

"Your majesty sees." said Richelieu, turning to the king, from whom the faint sparks of energy be had litely shown were now entirely gone. " Is there any medium to be kept with a person so convicted of error, and so obstimate in the wrrong J And is saich a person fit to educate the childron of France ? Your majesty has promised that the dauphin and the Duke of Anjou shall be given into my charce."

"I have," said the weak monarch, "and I will keep my promise."

"Never! never!" cried the queen, vehemently; "never, while Anne of Austria lives! Oh, my loss?" she exalaimed, advancing, and casting herself at the feet of the king with all the overpowering energy of maternal love; "coestder that I am their mother! Rob me not of my only hope, -rob me not of those dear children who have smiled and checker me through all my surrows. Oh, Louis: if 3 have the feelings of a father, if you have the feelings of a man, spare me this !"

The king turned away his head, and Richelieu, gliding behind the throne, placed himself at the queen's side. "Sign the paper," said he, in a low deep tone; " sign the paper, and they shall not be taken from you."

"Any thing ! any thing ! bet leave me my children !" exclaimed the amoon king the pen he offered her. "I ise 1

" You hay

dedly. " They shall ustria, receiving the

not be ta " Well

paper. " .

Il Heaven to wit

ere. ere p ness that I has anocent; any you, gentlemen of the council, to see that I sign a paper, the contents of which I know not, and part of which is certainly false." Thus saying, with a rapid hand she wrote her name at the bottom of the page, threw down the pen, and quitted the apartment.

The queen walked slowly, and in silence, to the apartments allotted to her use, without giving way to the various paintal feelings that struggled in her bosom ; but once arrived within the shelter of her own saloon, she sank into a chair, and burst into a flood of tears. Mademoiselle de Hauteford, who stood beside her endeavoured in vain for some time to calm her agitation, but at length succeeded in a degree.

"Oh. Clara !" said the queen, " you have ruined yourself for my sake."

"I hope, midain," replied the young lady, " that I have done my duty, which were enough in itself to reconcile me to my fate; but if I could suppose that I have served your majesty, I should be more than rewarded for any thing I may undergo."

"You have served me most deeply on this and every occusion," answered the queen ; "and the time may come, when the affection of Anne of Austria will not be what it is now .- the destruction of all that possess it. But why comes Mademoisella Anne of Austria! "they are but signify nothing " As I was walking in the gardens tinued Pauline, "a little peasant be nue, and asked if I could bring him your majosty. I was surprised at his asked him what was his business ; whe that he brought you a letter hom This seemed so important that I made him into the palace by the private gate cealed him is my spartments, till I ha "You did right, Pauline, you did right the gueen. . . It must surely be news troi nou. Bring the boy hither directly-no anteroom, but by the inner apariments Clara, station Laporte at the top of the stat see that no one approaches." Pauline flew to execute the quien's com and in a few minutes a clatter was heard it per champer, not at all unlike th Ly that most unfortunat mischievous h

RICHELLEU.

the queen, putting her hands to her cars. "They will alarm the whole house."

"Dame oui !" cried the boy, slipping his feet out of their incumbrances. "Jai cous oublié, et cous aussi, mademoiselle." turning to Pauline, who, anxious to hear of De Blenau, would have let him come in if he had been shed like a horse.

The little messenger now paused for a moment, then having glanced his eye over the ladies at the other end of the room, as if to ascertain to which he was to deliver his credentials, advanced straight to the queen, and falling down upon both his knees, tendered her a sealed packet.

"Well, my boy," said Anne of Austria, taking the letter, " whom does this come from ?"

" My father, the woodman of Mantes," replied the boy, "told me to give it into the queen's own hand; and when I had done so, to return straight to him and not to wait, for fear of being discovered."

"And how do you know that I am the queen ?" asked Anne of Austria, who too often suffered her mind to be distracted from matters of grave importance by trifling objects of amusement. "That lady is the queen," she continued, pointing to Madame de Beaumont, and playing upon the boy's simplicity.

"No, no," said Charles, the woodman's son, "she stands and you sit; and besides, you told them to take off my sabots, as if you were used to order all about you."

"Well," rejoined the queen, "you are right, my boy; go back to your father, and as a token that you have given the letter to the queen, carry him back that ring;" and she took a jewel from her finger, and put it into the boy's hand. "Mademoiselle de Beamont," she continue. "will you give this boy into the charge of Laporte, bidding him take him from the palace by the most private way, and not to leave him till he is safe out of Chantilly."

According to Anne of Anatria's command, Pau-

to explain her sensations. Let thus parted from some one that they love anxious for his safety and terrified who have waited in fear and agony delayed-let them call up all that tinging it with that shade of romance be expected in the mind of a young. instive Languedocian girl of 1613, th something like a picture of Pauline's without my helping them a bit. "Come hitiner, my wild rose," said th she saw her enter. " Here is a letter fr nau, full of sad news indeed. His situati ous in the extreme ; and though I am th all, I do not know how to aid him?" Pauline turned pale, but cast down her remained without speaking, and some set in some set in source of the set in the set of t ing her eilence, wafter the explanations I some days ago you can bave no farther " Oh, no, indeed ! madam mently, " and not ion, but will att mpt to wring something more from him, even by the prime forte et dure."

RICHELIEG.

Pauline read, and re-read the letter, and each time she did so the colour came and went in her cheek, and at every sentence she raised her large dark eves to the even as if inentiage what could be done for him silent for a time which was quic er too dangere proposed to bril vey a letter to ed : another pr. valet-de-chambr Laporte had onc. J.... n's ladies was sed some plan, jected, as eithcticable. One Bastifle to conas soon rejectte, the queen's lmittance; but re bimself, and was well known to all the officers of the prison; and another mentioned Seguin, Anne of Austia's surgeou; bat he also was not only too well known, but it appeared, from what De Bienau had informed the queen of his conference with Richelieu, that the very words of the message, which had been sent by him on the night of the young count's encounter with the robbers, had been communicated to the cardinal; and the whole party forgot that Louise, the soubrette, had been present when it was delivered.

In the meanwhile, Pauline remained profoundly silent, occupied by many a bitter reflection, while a thousand confused schemes flitted across her mind. like bubbles floating on a stream, and breaking as soon as they were looked upon. At length, however, she started, as if some more feasible plan presented itself to her thoughts—"I will go!" exclaimed she,--" Please your majesty. I will go."

"You, Pauline !" said the queen, " you, my poor girl ! You know not the difficulties of such an undertaking. What say you, Madame de Beaumont ?"

"That I am pleased, madam, to see my child show forth the spirit of her race," replied the marchioness. "Nor do I doubt of her success; for sure I am Pauline would not propose a p which had no good foundation."

"Then say how you intend to manage it the queen, with little faith in the practicabi Paoline's proposal. "I doubt me much, my gind, they will never let you into the B: Their hearts are as hard as the stones of the that they keep, and they will give you no i for love of your bright eyes."

"I do not intend to make that a plea," : Pauline, smiling in youthful confidence; ' will borrow one of my maid's dresses, and , less shall look as like a scubrette as any one. (directs us, here, to ask at the gate for Phi woodman of Mantes. Now he will most lik able to procure me admission; and if not, I c give the message to him and be sent away ag

"Oh, no, no?" cried the queen, "give a sages but in the last extremity. How do we that this woodman might not betray us, an Richelieu's suspicions still more ? If you c De Blenau, well—l will give you a letter for but if not. only tell the woodman to inform her immediate presence in Paris, for the arrang ment of her affairs. On their arrival in that cri the two ladies were to take up their abode with t old Marchioness de Senecy, one of the queen most devoted adherents, and to determine their f ture proceedings by the information they receive upon the spot.

RICHEETEU.

The greatest rapidity, however, was necessary any hope of success, and neither Pauline nor Mad moiselle de Hauteford lost any time in their prepr ations. The queen's letter to De Blenau was so written. Pauline borrowed from her maid Louis the full dress of a Languedoc peasant, provided he self with a considerable sum of money, that 1 means might be left untried, and having taken lear of her n other, whose hold counsels tended to rau her soirits and uphold her resolution, she place herself in the chaise roulants beside Mademoisel de Hauteford, buoyed up with youthful confidenand enthus issm.

It was rather an anxious moment, however, they passed the gates of the palace, which by sou accident were shut. This caused a momentary de lay, and several of the cardinal's guard (for Rich lieu assumed that of a body-guard among oth marks of royalty) gathered around the vehicle wil the idle curiosity of an unemployed soldiery. Pa line's heart beat fast, but the moment after she wi relieved by the appearance of the old concierge, porter, who threw open the gates, and the carries rolled out without any question being asked. He mind, however, was not wholly relieved till the were completely free of the town of Chantilly, an till the carriage slowly mounting the first little hi took a slight turn to avoid a steeper ascent, show ing them the towers of the chateau and the cours of the road they had already passed, without ar human form that could afford subject for alarm.

Pauline, seeing that they were not followed, gar herself up to meditations of the future, firmly b lieving that their departure had entirely escaped y observations of the cardinal. This, however, was not the case. He had been early informed that one of the queen's carriages was in preparation to carry some of the ladies of honor to Paris; but concluding that it was nothing more than the effect of that sentence of banishment which he had himself pronounced against Mademoiselle de Hauteford, he suffered Pauline and her companion to depart without inquiry or obstruction; although some of the many tools of his power had shut the palace gates, as if by accident, till his decision was known.

RICHELIED.

As the carriage rolled on, and Pauline reflected in silence upon the task she had undertaken, the bright colouring of the moment's enthusiasm faded away; the mists in which hope had concealed the rocks and precipices around her path no longer intercepted her view, and the whole difficulties and -dangers to which she exposed herself, presented themselves one after another to her sight. But the original motives still remained in full force. Her deep romantic attachment to De Blenau, her sense of duty to the queen, and that gene osity of purpose which would have led her at any time to risk her life to save the innocent-much more the innocent and loved-of these nothing could deprive her; and these kept up her resolution, although the very in--terest which her heart took in the success of her -endeavour, made her magnify the dangers, and tremble at the thought of failure.

CHAPTER XIX.

Which sh

hat they did with De Blenau in the Bastille, what he himself did to get out of it.

member of what is technically called Asay we or otherwise the House of Comthe lone after his election to mons. take heart fluttering both with conscientiously rehis opinions, and desolve term. o party : so had I. us duties of giving when I present form, deterthis work to. mined heroically to have no hero; but to do equal justice to all the several characters, and let each reader find a hero for himself.

However, parsuing the conree of the above-mentioned young member of the Commons House of Parliament, who soon begins to perceive, that it is as easy to eat oysters and brown sugar, as to vote with a party to whom he has a natural antipathy; or for the needle to fly from the magnet as for him to keep aloof from that faction to which individual interests, long-indulged habits, and early prejudices attach him; so. I soon began to find that my own feelings more particularly inclining me to the Count de Blenau. I unconsciously made him the hero of my tale, dilated on his history, enlarged upon his character, quitted him with regret, and returned to him with pleasure.

At present, however, the course of my tale naturally conducts me once more to the gloomy walls of the Bastille, to give some account of the circumstances which led to the latter events of the last chapter; and consequently 1 feel no hesitation in Oure more taking up the history of my hero.

The sleep of the Count de Blenau was fully as wound within the Bastille as it ever had been in his mem for a time; and the narr iron door, and the untapestried brought back to De Blennu's recpainful particular, to which sloep h porary oblivion. On rising, he missed in some dep ance to which he was accustomed less he contrived to get through the toilet without much difficulty; alti tollet without much announcy and was rendy at his call, no groom prop every part of his apparel. He then p the outer chamber, which he mental saloon, and would willingly have order. fast, but his apartments afforded no mo nunicating with those below, except door already mentioned; the secret of of 100 great importance to be lost upon No roundy presented itself but patie proceeding to the window, which opened admit the air, but which was strongly the outside with massy iron to amuse the time h in which recognised, as having either known them personally, of having seen them at the court, or with the army; and the strange assemblage of all different parties which met his eye in the court-yard of the Bastille, fully convinced him, that under the administration of a man who lived in constant fear that his ill-gotten power would be snatched from him, safety was to be found in no tenets and in no station.

Here he beheld some that had been of the party Mary de Medicis, and some who had been the avowed followers of Richelicu himsell's some that the minister suspected of being too much favoured by the king, and some, as in his own case, who had been attached to the queen. One he saw who was supposed to have favored the Huguenois in France, and one that had assisted the Catholic party in Germany.

"Well," thought De Blenau, "I am but one out of the many, and whatever plan I had pursued, most probably I should have found my way here somehow. Wealth and influence, in despotic governments, are generally like the planes of the ostrich, which often cause her to be hunted down, but will not help her to fly."

While engaged in such reflections, De Blenau heard the bolts of the door undrawn, and the governor of the prison entered, followed by his servant loaded with the various requisites for so substantial a meal as a breakfast of that period. De Blenau and the governor saluted each other with every outward form of civility ; and the count, perceiving that his custodier still lingered after the servant had disposed the various articles upon the table and had taken his departure, luckily remembered that this was one of the jours maigres of which he had heard, and invited his companion to partake of his morning meal. The governor agreed to the proposal sans jeérémonie, and having done ample ustice to the dish of stewed partridges, which ormed the principal ornament of the table by himself finished a bottle of the celebrated v Suresnes, which is one of the things now l the bons vivants of Paris.

De Blenan was not so much importuned b ger as to envy the governor the very large sh appropriated of the viands before him; and plenty of leisure to remark, that his com performed his feats of mastication with a w ful degree of velocity. But the governor reason for thus wishing to hurry, what was a very agreeable occupation, to its conclusio he had scarcely poured out the last goblet wine, and was still wiping and folding up his knife (which, by the way, was the constant panion of high and low in those days, at only implement they had for cutting their when the door opened, and a servant app giving the governor a significant nod, whice answered by a sign of the same kind.

Upon this the man retired, and the door

DICHELIEU.

fectly unconcerned as to his coming, let me assure you, though I feel obliged by your consideration for my appetite."

"He is here now, sir," replied the governor; "we had better, if you please, join him in the audience-hall. That servant came to announce his arrival."

" I will follow you instantly," replied the count; upon which the governor rose and opened the door.

The moment De Blenau had passed out, the guard, who had been stationed at the head of the stairs, followed at the distance of a couple of paces, while the governor led the way. In this order they proceeded to the inner court, which they had to pass before they could reach the audience-chamber. This open space was still filled by the prisoners, who, glad of the little liberty allowed them, soldom retired to their cells, except when obliged by the regulations of the prison. The moment De Blenau appeared in the court, there was a slight stir among its tenants, and the question of, "Who is he ? who is he ?" circulated rapidly among them.

"It is the Count de Blenau, by St. Louis !" exclaimed a deep voice, which De Blenau remembered to have heard somewhere before; but, though on looking round he saw several persons that he knew, he could not fix upon any one in particular as the one who had spoken.

He had not time, however, for more than a momentary glance, and was obliged to pass on to the door of the audience hall, which opened into a litlie narrow passage leading from the court. Here De Blanau paused for an instant to collect his thearbin, and then followed the governor, who had alernity entered.

The audience-hall of the Bastille was a large obliging chamber, dimly lighted by two high Gothc windows, which looked into the outer court. The scenty gleam of daylight which would be thus entered, had the space been open, was impeded by the dust and dirt of many a century, and by the thick crossing of the leaden framework, while its progress into the hall itself was also further obstructed by several heavy columns which supported the high pointed arches of the roof.

This roof, the apartment having been originally intended for the chapel, would have afforded a relief to the dullness of the rest by its beautiful proportions, and the highly finished tracery with which it was adorned, had the eye been able to reach it 5 but the rays, which from the causes above mentioned were barely enough to illuminate the lower part of the hall, were lost before they could attain its height, leaving it in that profound obscurity, which cast a double gloom upon the space below.

The pavement of this melanchely hall was damp and decayed, many of the stones having strayed from their bed of mortar, and become vagrant about the apartment; and the furniture, if it might be so called, far from filling it, served only to show its size and emptiness. At the farther extremity was a long table, at the end of which, in a chair somewhat elevated, sat the Judge Lafemas, with a clerk at a desk below him, and two or three exempts standing round about.

Near the end next De Blenau was another chair, which he conceived to be placed for his use; which between two of the pillars, sitting on a curious machine, the use of which De Blenau at once suspected, appeared an ill-favoured muscular old mnn, whose lowering brow and doggedness of aspect seemed to speak of many a ruthless deed.

As the count entered, the door closed after him with a loud clang; and advancing to the table, be took his sent in the vacant chair, while the governor placed himself at a little distance between hims and the judge.

"Well, Monsieur de Blenau," said Lafemas, in that sweet mild tone which he always assume when not irritated by the taugus of Chavigni, is the last place where I could have wished to m a nobleman whose general character has alw engaged my most affectionate esteem."

RICHELIET.

De Blennu'knew Lafemas to be one of the me est and most viperous of the cardinal's tools, a not feeling much moved to exchange courtes with him, he merely acknowledged the judge's sa tation by a silent how, while the other proceeds "I have requested the pleasure of your society a space in order to ask you a few questions; yo reply to which will, doubless, soon procure yo liberation from this unpleasant place."

"I trust so, sir," replied the count, "as the tention of an innocent person must occasion fu as much discredit to his majesty's government, as does inconvenience to the person himself."

"You are quite right, you are qui e right," joined the sweet-tongued judge. "Indeed, my wo object in coming is to obtain such answers from y as will convince the Cardinal de Richelieu, wi though a profound minister, is somewhat suspicir withal,-to convince him, I say, that you are im cent; of which, on my conscience, and as 11 lieve in the Saviour. I have no doubt myself,the first place, then," he continued, " tell me a friend, have you any acquaintsnce in Brussels?" "I have!" replied De Blenau, decidedly.

"That is horourable,—that is candid," said t judge. "I told you, Monsieur le Gouverneur, ti we should have no difficulty, and that Monsieur Bleneau would enable me easily to establish ianocence.—Pray do you correspond with the friends, he continued, " and by what means ?"

"I do correspond with them; but seldom : a then by any means that occur."

"Monsieur de Blenau," exclaimed Lafemas, " am enchanted with this frankness; but be a lit more specific about the means If you have particular objection to confide in me, mention channel that you call to mind, by which you sent letters to the Low Countries."

De Blenau fell somewhat disgusted with the sweet and friendly manner of a man whose deeds spoke him as cruel and as bloody-minded as a famished tiger; and unwilling to be longer mecked with soft words, he replied, "Sometimes by the king's courier, sir; sometimes by the cardinal's; and once I remember having sent one by your cousin De Merceau, but I believe that latter aever reached its destination; for you must recollect that De Merceau was hanged by Don Francisco de Mello, for ripping open the bag, and purloining the despatches."

"We have nothing to do with that, my dear count," said Lafemas, struggling to maintain his pheidity of demenour..." The next thing I have to inquire is,"--and he looked at a paper he held in his hand: " Have you ever conveyed any letters to the Low Coantries by any one else I"

De Blenau answered in the affirmative ; and the judge proceeded with a series of questions, very similar to those which had been asked by Richelieu himself, artfully striving to entangle the prisoner by means of his own admissions, so as to force him into farther confessions by the impossibility of receding. But beyond a certain point De Blenau would not proceed.

"Monsieur Lafemas," said he, in a calm firm tone, "I perceive that you are going into questions which have already been asked me by his eminence the cardinal, prime minister. The object in doing so is evidently to extort from me some contradiction which may criminate myself; and therefore henceforward. I will seply to no such questions whatsoever. The cardinal is in possession of any answers; and if you want them, you must apply to him."

"You mistake entirely, my dear count," and Lafemas; "on my salvation, my only object is serve you. You have already acknowledged on have forwarded letters from the queen.

RICHELMEU

addressed ? If those letters were not of a treasonable nature, why did she not send them by one of her own servants ?"

"When a queen of France is not allowed the common attendants which a simple gentlewoman can compand, she may often be glad to use the servants and services of her friends. My own retinue, sir, trebles that which the queen has ever possessed at St. Germain's. But, without going into these particulars, your question is at once replied to by reminding you, that I am her majesty's chamberlain and therefore her servant."

"Without there were something wrong, Monsieur de Blenau," said Lafemas, "you could have no objection to state whether you have or have not conveyed some letters from her majesty to Don John of Austria, Don Francisco de Mello, or King Philip of Spain. It is very natural[for a queen to write to her near relations, surely !"

"I have already said," replied De Blenau, " that I shall reply to no such questions, the object of which is alone to entangle me."

"Yen know not what you are exposing yourself to," rejoined the judge; " there are means within this prison which would easily compel an answer"

"None," replied De Blenau, firmly. "My recolution is taken, and no power on earth can shake it."

"Really, Monsieur de Blensu, it would hurt me to the heart to leave you to the dreadful fate which your migraken determination is likely to call upon you. I could weep, truly I could weep, to think of what you are calling upon your own head?" and the jadge glanced his eye inwards the machine, which we have already noticed, and from which the old man rose up, as if preparing for his task.

"You mean the torture ?" said De Blenne, ooking at it without a change of counterance. But let me tell you, Monsteur Laferma, that u dare not order it to a man of my rank, without an express warrant for the purpose; and, even if you had such authority, not all the torture in the world would wring one word from me. Ask that instrument of tyranny, sir," and he pointed to the executioner,—"ask him how the noble Caply died; and so would be Blennu also."

Lafemas looked at the governor, and the governor at the executioner, and so round. One of the dreadful secrets of the Bastille had evidently escaped beyond those precincts to which they were fearfully confined; no one could divine how this had occurred, and each suspected the other. A temporary silence ensued, and then Lafemas proceeded:

"The iorture ! no, Mousieur de Blenau : God forbid that I should think of ordering such a thing ! But let me advise you to answer; for I must, of course; report your refusal to the cardinal prime minister, and you know that he is not likely to consider either your rank or your fortune, but will, in all probability, order you the question ordinary and extraordinary instantly."

"The puilt be his, then !" said De Blenau, "I have already told you my resolution, sir; act upon it as you think fit."

'Iafemas' seemed at a loss, and a whispering consultation took place between him and the secretary, who seemed to urge more vigorous measures than the judge himself thought proper to pursue: for their conference was terminated by Lafemas exclaiming in a tone not sufficiently low to escape De Blennu's car, "I dare not, I tell you-4 date not-1 have no orders.-Monsieur de Blenau," he continued aloud, "you may now vetire, and I most report your answers to the cardenal. But let me advise you, as a sincere friend to be prepared with a reply to the questions of there now refused to answer, before we next me for by that time I shall have received has

RICHELHES.

nence's commands, which, I fear, will be more severe than my heart could wish "

De Blenau made no reply, but withdrew, escorted as before, and it were 'needless to deny, that, nowithstanding the coolness with which he had borne his examination, and the foritude with which he was prepared to repel the worst that could be inflicted, his heart beat high as the door of the audience-hall closed behind him, and he looked forward to returning to his apartments with more pleasure than a captive assally regards the place of his confinement.

The many agitating circumstances which had passed since, had completely banished from his thoughts the voice which he had lieard pronounce his name, on the first time of his crossing the court ; but as he returned, his eye fell upon the form of a tall, strong man, standing under the archway ; and he instantly recognised the woodman of the forest of Mantes.

De Blennu had spoken to him a thousand times in his various hunting-excursions, and he could not help being astorished to meet him in such a place, little dreaming that he himself was the cause. "What, in the name of Heaven!" thought he, " can that man have done to werit confinement here ? Surely, Richelien, who affects to he an eagle of the highest flight, might stoop on pohlor prey than that."

As these thoughts crossed his mind, he passed by the foot of the little tower, containing the staircrase which communicated with his apartments by the iron door in the inner chamber. This had evidently been long disuased, and on remembering the position of the two chambers which he occupied, he conceived that they must have been at one time quite distinct, with a separate entrance to each, the one being arrived at by the turret, and the other by the chief staircrase. He had, owever, only time to take a casual glance, and seely refrained from making that very apparent; for the governor, who walked beside him, kept his eyes always constantly fixed upon him, as if to prevent any communication even by a sign with the other prisoners.

RICHELIED

On arriving at his chamber, the governor allowed him to pass in alone, and having fastened the door, returned to Lafemas, leaving De Blenau to meditate over his situation in solitude. The first pleasure of having escaped from immediate danger having subsided, there was nothing very cheering to contemplate in his position. His fate, though postponed, seemed inevitable. Richelien, he knew, was no way scrupplous; and the only thing which honour could permit him to do, was to defend the queen's secret with his life.

⁴ The queen herself indeed might relieve him from this difficulty, if he could find any way of communicating with her. But in looking round for the means, absolute impossibility seemed to present itself on all sides. In vain he sought for expedients y his mind suggested none that a second thought confirmed. He once contemplated inducing the governor to forward a letter by the temptation of a large bribe : bot a moment's reflection showed him that it was a thousand to one that the smooth-spokon officer both accepted his bribe and hetrayed his trust.

Many other plans were rejected in a like mannor, from a conviction of their impracticability, till at length a vague thought of gaining an interview with the woodman of Mantes, and, if possible, engaging him to bribe some of the inferior officers of the prison, crossed De Blenau's mind; and he was till endeavouring to regulate his ideas on the subject, when the bolts were once more withdrawn, and the governor again entered the anartment.

"Let me congratulate you, Monsieur De Blenau," said he, with a look of sincere pleasant which probably sprang more from the prospect continued gain to himself than my abainset great

RICHELICU.

nence's commands, which, I fear, will be more severe than my heart could wish "

De Blennu mode no reply, but withdrew, escorted as before, and it were needless to deay, bint, notwithstanding the coolness with which he had borne his examination, and the forritude with which he was prepared to repel the worst that could be inflicted, his heart beat high as the door of the audience-hall closed behind him, and he looked forward to returning to his apartments with more pleasure than a captive assally regards the place of his confinement.

The many agitating circumstances which had passed since, had completely banished from his thoughts the voice which he had heard pronounce his name, on the first time of his crussing the court; but as he returned, his eye fell upon the form of a tall, strong man, standing under the archway; and he instantly recognised the woodman of the forest of Mantes.

De Blenau had spoken to him a thousand times in his various hunting-excursions, and he could not help being astonished to meet him in such a place, little dreaming that he himself was the cause. "What, in the some of Heaven!" thought be, " caus that man have done to merit confinement here ? Surely, Richelien, who affects to be an eagle of the highest flight, might stoop on nobler prey than that."

As these thoughts crossed his mind, he passed by the foot of the little tower, containing the staircase which communicated with his apartments by the iron door in the inner chamber. This had evidently been long disused, and on remembering the position of the two chambers which he occupied, he conceived that they must have been at one time quite distinct, with a separate entrance to each, the one being arrived at by the turret, and the other by the chief staircase. He had, however, only time to take a casual glance, and bisely refrained from making that very apparent

the other prisoners. communication On arriving at his chamber, the go him to pass in alone, and having last retarned to Lafetnas, leaving De B tate over his situation in solitude. T are of having escaped from immediate subsided, there was nothing very che template in his position. His fate, the ed, seemed inevitable; Richelieu, he no way scrapulous; and the only thing our could permit him to do, was to queen's secret with his life. The gueen herself indeed might relieve this difficulty, if he could find any way of cating with her. But in looking round means, absolute impossibility seemed to p self on all sides. In vain he sought for exp his mind suggested none that a second thou firmed. He once contemplated inducing ernor to forward a letter by the temptation large bribe : but a moment's reflection that it was a thousand to one en efficer both acces trunt cation in De Blenau's safety. "Monsieur Lafemas is gone, and as the cardinal is at Chantilly, you will be safe for three or four days at least, as nothing can be decided till his eminence returns."

RICHELIERL

De Blenau well knew how to estimate the kindness of his friend the governor; but though he put its proper value upon it, and no more, he felt the necessity of striving to make his interested meanness act the part of real friendship.

"Well, Monsieur le Gouverneur," said he, assuming a cheerful air, "I suppose, then, that I shall re rain with you a day or two longer; nor should I, indeed, care so much for the continement, where I am so well treated, if I had some one to wait upon me whom I have been accustomed to."

"I do not know how that could be arranged," replied the governor, thoughtfully; "I would do any ihing to serve you, Monsieur de Blenau, consistent with my duty, but this is quite contrary to my orders; and if I were to allow you one of my own servants, it would put me completely in his power."

"Oh, that would not do at all," said De Blenau ; "but are there not some of the inferior prisoners"—The governor's brow darkened.—"Ol course," continued the count, "you would have to pay them for their trouble—and I, of course, would reimburse you. If you think that three hundred crowns would induce one of them to wait on the for the time I am hero, I would willingly pay the money into your hands, and you could mike ait the necessary arrangements for the purpose."

The countenance of the governor gradually cleared up as De Blenau spoke, like a sheltered loke that, after having been agitated for a moment by some unwonted breeze, soon relapses into its calm tranquility, when that which disturbed it has passed away. The idea of appropriating, with such unquestioned facility, the greater part of three hunbred crowns, was the sun which thus speedily disteneed the clouds upon his brow: and he mused of state in the Bastille-Bnt stay licitoue idea crossing his mind, 2 was a man brought here this more people, and they told me to give liberty, and employ him in the pris "Tont will just do then," said wardly praying that it might be th man of Mantes. "He can visit me ! ly during the day, to see if I have ne the gaard at the door can take good not follow him out, which is all that mands," "Of course, of course," replied th " it is your safe costedy alone which I to: and farther, I am ordered to give convenience and attention, which war allowing you an attendant at least. But your dinner, sir." "Dianer !" exclaimed De Blenau, " not yet noon," But so it proved ; the passed more quickly than he thou had he any reason to rener, for the dred crowns under the specious name of wages to the attendant.

$60

This arrangement, and the dinner, came to a conclusion much about the same time; and the governor, who had probably been engaged with De Blenau's good cheer much longer than was quite consistent with his other duties, rose and retired, to seek the inferior prisoner whose name he could not remember, but whom he piously resolved to reward with a crown per diem, thinking that such unparalleled liberality ought to be recorded in letters of gold.

In regard to De Blenau, the governor looked upon him as the goose with the golden eggs; but more prudent than the boy in the fable, he resolved to prolong his life to the numost of his power, so long, at least, as he continued to produce that glittering ore which possessed such wonderful attraction in his eyes. De Blenau, however, was not the goose he thought lim; and though he waited with some impatience to see if the person on whom so much might depend, were or were not his honest friend the woodman, yet his thoughts were deeply engaged in revolving every means by which the cupidity of the governor might be turned to his own advantage.

At length the bolts were undrawn, and the prisoner, fixing his eyes upon the door, behold a little old man enter, with withered cheeks and sucken eyes; a greasy nightcap on his hea", and a large knife suspended by the side of a long thin sword, which sometimes trailed upon the ground, and sometimes with reiterated blows upon the tendons of his menger shanks, seemed to reproach them for the bent and cringing posture in which they carried the woodcock-like hody that surmounded them. " Well, sir!" and De Blenau, not a fittle disap-

"Well, sir1" said De Blenau, not a little disappointed with this apparition; "are you the person whom the governor has appointed to wait upon me ?"

" Out, monsieur," said the little man, laying his to say, formerly vivandier; at aubergistie ici à la porte de la Bas have the honour to furnish the seigneur, and I have come for th "Oh, is that all !" cried De them, take them, my good friend, The little man vowed that m him too much honour, and gatheriz with admirable desterity, he held his left arm, reserving his right to heart, in which position he addre profound bow to De Blenau, and I ment. The prisoner now waited so ting more and more impatient as t on. At length, however, the door opened, and Philip the woodman him ed. Between Philip and the young court of course much to be explained, wh ing no explanation to the reader, shall recapitulated. Every circumstance, he Philip told, whether of his inform him of th nies, he at once demanded if Philip would and could convey a letter from him to the queen.

Of his willingness, the woodman said, there was no doubt; and after a moment's thought he added, that he had reason to hope that oppo tunity also would be afforded him. "It will be dangerous," said he, "but I think I can do it."

"Tell me how, good friend," demanded de Blenau, "and depend upon it, whatever risks you run on my account, whether 1 live or die, you will be rewarded."

"I want no reward, sir," answered Philip, " but a good cause and a good conscience; and I am sure, if I serve you, I am as well engaged as if I were cutting all the fugots in Mantes. But my plan is this: they tell me, that my children shall always be allowed to see me. Now I know my boy Charles, who is as active as a piceerf, will not be long before he follows me. He will be here before nightfall, I am sure, and he shall take your letter to the queen."

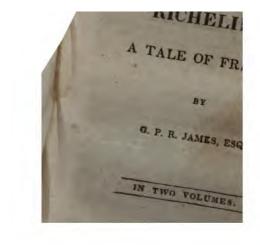

De Blenau remained silent for a moment. "Was it your son who brought your letter to me ?" demanded he. The woodman assented; and the count continued: "he was a shrewd boy, then. At all events, it must be risked. Wait, I will write, and depend upon you."

The woodman, however, arged that if he staid so long, suspicion might he excited, and Be Blemau suffered him to depart desiring him to return in an hour, when the letter would be ready. During his absence, the prisoner wrote that epistle which we have already seen delivered. In it he told his situation, and the nature of the questions which had been asked him by Lafemas. He hinted also that his fate was soon likely to be decided; and desired, that any communication which it might be uncessary to make him, might be conveyed through the woodman of Mantes.

More than one hour elapsed after this letter as written before Philip again appeared. When fear they suspect something. Is the De Bienau placed it in his hand, be Brenau pincen it in ins name, have added some gold. "The queet ly," said he, "and your son will we bis journey." "No, no, sir," replied Philip, " that a child. Let him have a broad-piece to help him on, but no more." "Well then," said the count, "acc for your services. Thave notice in that "Not so either, monseigneur, a: swore man. " Pay for what is done, when it and taking the letter and one gold piece, apartment, END OF VOLUME I.

-

- · ·

.

and the second states of the s

CHAPTER I.

Which shows that Arcident holds Windom hy the leg, and like a pig driver with a pig, often makes her go forward by pulling her back.

THE heavy carriage which conveyed Pauline de Beaumont towards Paris rolled on with no great rapidity, and the time, to her anxious mind, seemed lengthened t an inconceivable degree. Towards night, every little town they entered she conceived to be the capital, and was not undeceived till Mademoiselle de Hauteford observed, that they had set out so late she was afraid they would be obliged to pass the might at Ecouen.

In her companion Pauline found but little to console or south her under the anxiety and fear which the dangerous enterprise she had undertaken naturally produced. Mademoiselle de Hauteford had little either of warmth of heart or gentleness of disposition; and such were the only qualities which could have assimilated with Pauline's feelings we that time.

In combating the passionate love with which the king had regarded her, Mademoiselle de Hanteford had entirely triamphed over her own heart. aving crushed every human sensation that it con lained, she substituted a juicid principle of du mind. She talked calmly of all the difficulties and dangers which presented themselves, and of the best means of obviating them's but did not offer the least consolation to the fears of a young and inexperienced girl, who had taken upon herself a bold and perilous enterprise, in which her own happiness was at stake, as well as the lives and fortunes of others. The indifferent coolness with which she spoke of risks and obstacles, was far from reassuring Pauline, who soon dropped the conversation, and sinking into herself, resolved all the circumstances in her mind; her heart sometimes beating high with hope, sometimes sickening at the thought of failure.

Thus in silence the travellers proceeded to Ecouen, where, from the lateness of the hour, they were obliged to pass the night; but leaving it early the next morning, they reached Paris in a short time, and alighted at the hotel of the Marchioness de Seneey. That lady, it appeared, was absent, hav: ing left Paris some time before for a distant part of the country : but this was no disadvantage, as Mademoiselle de Hauteford was well known to the paysan, and treated the domestics with the same familiarity which they showed towards her.

An old and confidential servant of the queen was the only male attendant who accompanied them to Paria, and he took especial care not to undeceive the others in regard to Mademoiselle de Beaunont's rank, though he had more than once nearly betrayed the secret by smiling at the lady's mail airs which Pauline contrived to assume. This task, however, was not of long duration ; for Pauline's auxiety would not suffer her to remain inactive, and she accordingly pressed her companion to set out speedily for the Bastille, alraid that under any long delay her courage, which she felt to be failing every moment, might give way entirely, and that she might at length prove unequal to accomplish her undertaking.

Mademoiselle de Hauteford, whose acquaintance with the city qualified her to act as guide, readily agreed to proceed immediately on their expedition; and Pauline's disguise as soubrette, not permitting her to make use of a mask like her companion, she covered her head as far as she could with a large capuehin of brown tafetas, which, however, was allimufficient to conceal her face. This being done, she followed the lady of honour into the street, and in a moment found herself immensed in all the bustte and confusion of the capital.

Poor Pauline's senses were almost bewildered by the crowd; but Mademoiselle de Hauteford leaning on her arm, hurried her on as far as the Rue St. Antoine, where she stopped opposite the Church of St. Grevais, or rather the narrow dirty street which leads towards it.

Here she directed Pauline straight on to the Basdille, and pointing out the church, told her that she would wait there for her return, offering up provers for the success of her enterprise.

The magnificent peristyle of the Church of 9 Gervaise, which the celebrated De Brosse is a to have pronounced the most perfect of his workom, and read the secret she was so anxious to ceal.

At length, however, her eye rested on a g of heavy towers, presenting nothing but m stone walls, pierced with loop-holes, and surme ted at various distances with embrasures, three the aperture of which the threatening mouth some large cannon were occasionally vis Sweeping round this gloomy building was a b fosse filled with water, which prevented all proach but at one particular point, where a d bridge, suspended by two immeose chains, access to the outer court. But even here no s precaution was taken to guard against any came in other than friendly guise; for the which terminated the bridge on the inner side. sides the security afforded by its ponderous d and barricadoes, possessed two flanking-towers artillery of which commanded the whole co of the approach. Pavline had often heard the Bashlle des and its horrors detailed by the guests who occasionally visited her mother's chateau in Languedoc; but whatever idea she had formed of it, the frowning strength and gloomy horrors which the original presented, far outdid the picture her imagination had drawn; and so strong was the sensation of fear which it produced upon her mind, that she had nearly turned back and run away the moment she beheld it. An instant's reflection, however, reawakened her courage.

RICHELLEU.

"Claude de Blenau," she thought, "immured within those walls ! and do I hesitate when his life. perhaps, depends upon my exertion ?" That thought was enough to recall all her resolution ; and rapidly crossing the drawbridge, she passed what is called the grille. But here her farther progress was stayed by a massy door covered with plates and studs of iron, which offered none of those happy contrivances either of modern or ancient days, by which people within are called upon to communicate with people without. There was no horn, as in the days of chivalry, and if there had been, Pauline could not have blown it; but still worse, there was neither bell nor knocker; and the door, far from imitating the gates of Dis, in standing open night and day, seemed most determinately shut, although the comparison might have held in many other respects. With shaking knees and trembling hands Pauline tried for some moments to gain admission, but in vain. The gate resisted all her weak efforts, her voice was scarcely audible, and vexed, wearied, and terrified, and not knowing what to do, she burst into a flood of tears.

At about a hundred yards on the other side of the fosse, forming one corner of the Rue St. Antoine, on the face of which it seemed a wart, or impossiume, stood a little narrow house of two stories high, the front of which displayed an immensibourd covered with a curious and remarkable & view. This represented no other than the form an enormous wild boar, with a knapkin to under his chin, seated at a table, on which amoked various savoury dishes, of which the above ferocious gentleman appeared to be partaking with a very wild-boarish appeared to be partaking with a written, in characters of such a size that those who run might read, Au sanglier gournmand, and then followed a further inscription, which went to state that Jacques Chatpilleur, autrefois vivandier de l'Armée de Perpignan, à present aubergiste traitieur, fed the hungry and gave drink to those that thirsted, at all hours of the day and night.

RICHELIED.

Every one will allow that this man must have been blessed with a charitable disposition; and it so happened that, standing at his own door, with his heart opened by the benign influence of having cooked a dinner for the Count de Blenau, he beheld the ineffectual efforts of Pauline de Beaumont to gain admission into the Bastille.

The poor little man's heart was really moved ; and skipping across the drawbridge, he was at her ride in a moment. "What seek you, charmante demoiselle?" demanded the aubergiste, making her a low bow; and then observing her tears, he added, "Ma pauve fille, do not weep. Do you wish to get in here ?"

"Yes, indeed," replied Pauline; "but I cannot make them hear."

"There are many who want to get out, who cannot make them hear either," said the addergiste: "but they shall hear me, at all events." So aying, he drew forth his knife, with a flourish which made Pauline start back, and applied the handle with such force to the gate of the prison, that the whole place echoed with the blows. Immediately, a little wicket was opened, and the head of a sarly-looking porter presented itself to the anonerture.

"Philip the woodman ! Philip the woodman " said he, as soon as he heard Pauline's inquiries. "Who is he, I wonder ? We have nothing wood with) woodmen here. Oh, I remember the man

RICHELIEW.

0

And we are to break through all rules and regulations for him, I suppose? But I can tell Monsieur Chavigni, or whoever give the order, that I shall not turn the key for any one except at proper hours : an you cannot see him now, young woman—you cannot see him now.⁷

"And is not this a proper hour ?" asked Pauline. "I thought midday was the best time I could come."

" No !" answered the porter, "I tell you no, my pretty demoiselle ; this is the dinner-hour, so you mustcome again."

"When can I come then, sir ?" demanded Pauline, "for I have journeyed a long way to see him."

"Why, then you are in need of rest." replied the other, "so you will be all the batter for waiting till estening. Come about seven o'clock, and you shall see him."

"Cannot I see him before that ?" asked the young lady, terrified at the delay.

Pauline was unprepared with an answer, but the necessity of the moteent made her reply, "His draghter," trasting that, as there must be some understanding between him and De Blemm, the woodman would conceive her errand and not betray any surprise, whether he had a daughter or not.

During this conversation, the aubergiste had remained hard by, really compassionating Pauline's disappointme t.

" Ma puerre fille " said he, as the wirket closed. " am very sorry that they treat vou so; but they is a great brates in these prisons. Bon Dieu ! you have very pale. Come in with me here to say sour old woodman. These great states have their little relaxations. So that is i iselle? He takes special care of the the daughter's sake."

There was a drop or two of the warn Languedoc flowing in Pauline's vein's wi gentleness, and her patience now became ly exhausted. "Well, sir!" she answer have to say to you is, that if I meet with lence, it may cost you dear. So bring my father, or refuse me at once."

"I am not going to refuse you, my p oiselle," replied the porter; "though, speak more like a haly of quality than a daughter. Now I'll swear you are Madar tesse's surreante. Nay, do not toss you impatiently; your father will be here in he knows of your having called at the y morning, and is to come here to see you But here is the governor, as I live-goin twilight walk. I suppose."

As he snoke the governor approached few paces distance, well armed with sword and pistol.

It was now quite dark, and the streets not being so crowded as when she before passed through them, Pauline proceeded more calmly, except when the torch-bearers of some of the gay world of Paris flashed their flambeaux in her eyes as they lighted their lords slong to party or spectacle. At the Church of St. Gervais she again left Mademoiselle de Hauteford with the servant; and now, well acquainted with the way, ran fightly along till she arrived at the Bastille, where, not giving her resolution time to fail, she passed the drawbridge, and entered the outer gate, which was at that moment open. Before her stood the figure of the porter, enjoying the cool evening air that blew through the open gate into the court. His hand rested upon the edge of the door, and the moment Pauline entered, he pushed it to with a clang that made her heart sink.

"Whom have we here," said he, " that comes in so boldly? Oh, so ' is it yon, mar belle demoiselle " b, continued, as the light of the latterns which hung under the arch fell upon her countenance -" well, you shall s e your tather now. But first, I think you had better go and speak to the governor ; he is a man of taste, and would like such a pretty prisoner, no doubt; perhaps he might find a warrant for your detention."

Pauline's heart sank at the idea of being carried before the governor, well knowing how little competent she was to answer any inquiries concerning her errand, but the excess of lear will often give courage, and the most timid mimals turn and resist when pressed to extremity. Thus Pauline summoned up all her resolution, and remembering the allusion which the porter had matte to Chaving's orders in favour of the woodman, she replied bold by: "This is no time for jesting, sir! and as to do taining me, it would be as much as the government post is worth, if it cannot ears, that he over thought

"So, so !" cried the pare a friend of Monsieur d there was scarething in our old woodman. These have their little relaxed iselle ? He takes the daughter's sake."

There was a drop in transition Languedoc flowing in the line gentleness, and her ly exhausted. "Well with have to say to you in lence, it may cost you the my father, or refore m

"I am not going a round orselfe," repland the particular backhore like a loss and daughter. Now I'll terse's subrunk: impatiently; your failure will be known of your failure will be known of your failure morning, and is to employed But here is the governo.

As he spoke, the government and have you got here, parter 77 Level ed Pauline with a chill lastrown her shrink.

" This is the woodman's day the man, " who wishes to pro-

" By the keys of St. Peter in my own way," exclaimed the a beautiful draghter for a could by mother did not help the target What is thy father's name

Terrified, confused, and the man's name, Pauline faltered form what she said, "I do nut know." "Ha ! ha ! ha ! thou say ou re have any thing like that in the Bastille! her go out till I come bad less, that woodman would be glad to have her w ith him; if so, we will find her a cell." Philip turned his ear to catch what the governor was saying, but not being able to hear it distinctly, he addressed himself to Pauline loud enough to reach every one round. "Come," said he, "ma fille, you are frightened at all these towers and walls and places; but it is not so unpleasant after one is in it either. Take my arm, and I'll show you the Pauline was glad to accept of his offer, for her steps faltered so much that she could hardly have way." proceeded without assistance : and thus, leaning on the woodman, she was slowly conducted through a great many narrow passages, to the small vanited chamber in which ne was lodged. As soon as they had entered, the woodman shu the door, and placing for Pauline's use the onl chair that the room contained, he began to pos forth a thousand excuses for the liberty he had tak with her cheek. "I hope you will conside the great object for which she came recover the ascendency : and she g ed sufficient command over her id hend the nature of the excuses whi still offering for his presumption, as I "You did perfectly right," replied having extricated us from a dangerous merit my sincere thanks. But now," s " without loss of time I must see th Blenau," "See the Count de Blenau !" exclu in astonishment, "Impressible, maa Utterly impossible: I can deliver a message; but that is all I can do." "Way not ?" demanded Pauline." "Way not ?" demanded Pauline. sake, do not triffe with me. If you ha mission to his prison, why cannot you d Because, mudemoiselle, there is a his door who would not allow you to pay Philip. "I have no wish to trille with ye but what you ask is morely impo do not stay long, for I am afraid of remaining here by myself."

The woodman promised not to be a moment, and hastened to the Count de Elenan's spariment, where the wary sentinel, as usual, examined him well to ascertain his identity before he gave him admission. He then entered and communicated as rapidly as possible to De Blenau the message he had received.

"It is Mademoiselle de Hauteford, without doubt," said de Blenau, thoughtfully ; "I must see her by all meaus."

"See her, sir!" exclaimed Philip, "The guard will never let her pass. It is quite impossible." "Not so impossible as you think. The gates of

"Not so impossible as you think. The gates of the inner court do not shut, I think, till nearly nine --Is there any one in the court ?"

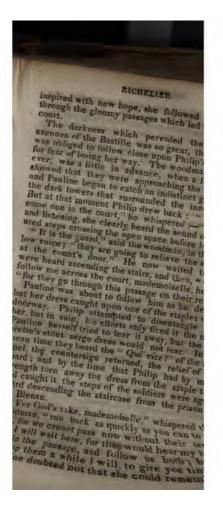

"No one, sir," answered the woodman; " all the state prisoners were locked up at six."

"Weil then, Philip," proceeded De Blenau, "do you know a small tower in the court, where you just see through the archway part of an eld flight of atens ?"

"Oh yes, I know it well," replied Philip. "The tower is never used now, they tell me. There is a heap of obbish in the doorway." "Exactly," said the coort, "Now, my good

"Exactly," said the count. "Now, my good Philip, bring the lady with all speed to that tower, and up the ol's flight of steps till you come to a small iron door : push that with your hand, and you will find that it brings you into the inner room where I will wait for you."

Philip's juy and astonishment found vent in three Bon dien's I and three Est-it possible's, and rushing away without more bass of time, he flew to Pauline, whose stay in his cell had been undistarhed by any thing but her own anxions fears. These, however, magnified every sound into the approach of some one to be dreaded. Even the footstep of the woodman indle herheart beat with alarm ; but the news he brought far more than compensated for it, and turnings, and, gliding along as fast as possible, she endeavoured to find her way back. As she went, she heard some words pass between Philip and the guard ; and immediately after she distinguished that they had entered the passage, for the echoing tramp of their feet, reverberated by the low arches, seemed following close upon her. Terrified and agitated, she flew on with the speed of lightning. Bat we all know how difficult it is to retrace any course we have pursued in the dark; and in her haste and confusion Pauline lost the turning she ought to have taken, and, afraid of going back, even after she discovered her mistake, she paused for a moment in a state of alarm and suspense. little short of agony.

RICHELIEC,

She could now distinctly hear the guard approaching, and not knowing where the passage might terminate, or what might obstruct the path, she felt her way with her hand along the wall, till at length she discovered a small recess, apparently one of those archways which gave entrance to the various cells, for beneath her fingers she felt the massy bolts and fastenings which secared it from without. She had scarce a moment to think, but, placing herself under the arch, she drew back as far as possible, in the hope that sheltered by the rocess, and concealed by the darkness, the guard would pass her by unabliced.

It was a dreadful moment for poor Pauline. The soldiers were not so near as the echoes of the place had led her to imagine; and she had several minutes to wait, kolding her breath, and drawing herself in, as if to nothing, while the tramp of the armed feet came userer and nearer, till at length she felt, or fancied that she felt, their clothes brush against her as they passed; and then heard their steps becoming fainter and more faint as they procoded to some other part of the building.

It was not till all was again silent, that Pauline ventured, still trembling with the danger she had ust escaped, to seek once more the path she had lost in her terror. But her search was now in vain; she had entirely forgot the turnings that she had taken in her flight, and in the darkness only went wandering on from one passage to another, starting at every sound, and always convinced that she was mistaken, but not knowing in what direction to seek the right.

At length, however, she found herself at a gateway which led into what seemed an open court, and imagining from the towers she saw round about, that she had arrived once more at the spot from which she had been frightened by the approach of the guards, she resolved again to seek more cautiously the cell of the woodman, to which, of course, he would return in search of her. But as she turned to put this resolve in execution, she perceived a light coming down the passage towards her; and without giving herself a moment to reflect that it might possibly be the woodman himself, fear seized her again, and darting across the court, she looked round for some place of concealment.

Exactly opposite she perceived another archway similar to the one she had left, and concealing herself within it, she paused to see who it was that followed, it just occurring to her mind at that instant, that perhaps she was in full career away from the very person she wished to find. But, the moment after, the light appeared in the archway, and glancing on the face of the man who carried it, discovered to her the features of the governor.

This sight was not calculated to allay her fears ; but her alarm was infinitely increased when she perceived that he began crossing the court towards the spot where she stood. Flight again became her resource, and turning to escape through the passages to which she supposed that archway led, as well as the others, she struck her foot agrees some steps and had nearly fallen. Recovering herself, however, without loss of time she beg ascending the steps that hay before her, are pod, till reaching a small landing-place, ed through one of the loopholes in the wall, and beheld the governor directing his course to another part of the building.

Satisfied that he did not follow her, but faint and out of breath with the speed she had employed in her flight, Pauline paused, for a moment's repose ; and stretching out her hand, she leaned against a door which stood at the top of the staircase :however, it afforded her no support, for the moment she touched it, it gave way under her hand, her a well-lighted and flying c ipon Pauline ; her apartment. n glare, and draweves were L. ing back she n headlong down the stairs, but at. : was caught in the arms of De Blenau.

CHAPTER II.

Which gets Pauline out and Philip in, and leaves De Blenau in the middle.

THE tumult of joy and surprise—the mutual explanations—the delight of De Blenau—the relief of Pauline—with the thousand little et cetera of such a meeting. I must leave to the reader's imagination, which will doubtless do much more justice to every circumstance than could the quill of a foolish bird such as I hold in my hand. Neither shall I dilate upon the surprise of Philin the woodman, when, on coming to inform De Blenau that he discovered that she had found her way to the object of her search without his sage guidance

A IOHELITER.

One piece of information, however, he convewhich hurried their conference towards a corsion. The governor, he said, who had been abhad returned, and was then engaged in visiting western wards ; and therefore he might be sh expected in that part of the prison.

This unpalateable news reminded Pauline tliver the letter from the queen, which in the and agitation of their first meeting she had neg ed to do. De Blenau looked it over with a he glance. "She commands me, said he, " to fess all exactly as it occurred; but on one or points I have already refused to answer, and do so now without producing the queen's wa for my conduct, I shall be held a base coward, betrays his trust for fear of the tortore."

"And do you hesitnie, Claude ?" demanded line, rather reproachfully--" do you hesitate to the only means which can save you ? Do you : nothing of what 1 feel ? You, Claude, ma proof against corporeal torture; but I canno dure much longer the mental agony I have sui since you have been confined here, espec when I reflected that even while you were a most nobly. I was suspecting you ungenerous; you love me as you profess, dear Claude, you take the means that the queen directs to e your safety."

"Well, dearest Pauline," replied De Bis yielding to the all-persuasive eloquence of wor lips, "I will do as you wish, and endeavour to sue such measures as will be both safe and ho ble. But now conclude what you were tellin of having lost yourself in the prison, and how found your way hither."

It may be necessary to explain, that while conversation had taken place between Deand Pauline in the inner apartment, PDwoodman had remained in the outer keeping watch with his car to the dicommunicated with his staircase, in em in time of the governor's approach Polad not time to conclude her little his rilous escapes and dangers ere Philip, erom the outer chamber interrupted her own the stairs, mademoiselle," cried Lie, ait at the bottom till I join you. The govcoming, for I hear other steps on the stairs at those of the sentinel at the top."

as are not places for great ceremonies, nor he mighty delicacies of general society ; so suffered De Bleanu to press his lips upon reproved, and then field down the back stairth the speed of light; after which the count d bolted the iron door, and passed into the number, while the woodman busiled about uner one, arranging the count's apparel for R, and appearing much more busy than he ras.

every thing was as it should be when the r entered; but still there was an angry spot s brow, and with but a slight inclination to au, he looked through the door between chambers, saying, "Well, Mr. Woodman es, where is your daughter ? She is not in 1."

a have made sure of that in person, I suppose, Philip, in his usual surly manner.

iether I have or not," answered the goveroes but little signify. I ask where is your in 7. We must have no strangers wandering the Bastille."

now my child's beauty as well as you do, r," replied Philip," and was too wise to er in my cell, where every one that chose inve liberty and time to affront her, while 1 ending upon Monsieur le Compte here : so her come with me, and set her under the of the old tower to wait till 1 was done. monsieur has done with me, I will co and her to the outer gate, and never with my and De Blenny, as the Woodman ready to depart ; and then seeing turned to follow him out, he adde Gouverneur, will you sup with me Philip quitted the room, but th obliged to stay to reply. "With pla pleasure said he, "I will be back diately, before my servant brings t I must first take the liberty of seein elle out of the prison gates ". He the nau, and having bolted the door, follow man quickly down the steps. Philip. gained so much upon him, that he had per to Fauline, whom he found waiting way rea The governor is coming, but do n ed. Let him think that I bade you w here till I had attended the count." Pauline, however, could not help being While the excitoment of her enterprise tinued, it afforded a false sort of course carried her through ; but now that h thought of enco fearan mure features to advantage, especially in the u coming light of the lamp that flickered upon t but at intervals, tipping all the actue angles of countenance with not the most agreeable huc, desire that you would not come at all; you | been here once too often already. Let your be er Charles come the next time."

24

The governor darted a glance at Philip, which tainly evinced that his face could take on, who liked, an expression of hatred, malice, and all un ritableness; and in a minute or two after, by a means, the lamp went out in his hands. " if Philip," cried he, 't take the lamp, and get a lig

"Your pardon sir," answered the sturdy W man; "not till I have seen my daughter bey the gates."

"Philip Grissolles, or Philip the Woodman whatever you call yourself," cried the gove "are you read ? Do you know what you are ab Go and fetch me a light instantly or refuse m your peril."

"I'do refuse then," replied the Woodman. Indicarned by conversation with the porter and the keys, how much power the governor had places his hands by permitting him to attend upon Court de Blenau; "I am your prisoner, sir," continued, "but not your servant."

"I have allowed you to act as such in the prissaid the governor, " and there are no servants but mine."

"In suffering me to attend upon the Count de nau," rejoined Philip, boldy, "you have out ste your duty, and broken the express order of the dinal. So much have I learned since I came he therefore allow my daughter to depart quietly, We shall find a light in the porter s room."

"By heavens! I hav a mind to detain the gir night, for your insolence," cried the gove stamping with rage, Oh, for God's sake do not !" exclaimed P clushing her hands : but Philip cane close of

-"You dare not," said he, in a low voice ; "for your head, you dare not." And then added aloud to Pauline, "Come along, my child; Monsieur le Gouverneur will let you out."

During this altercation they had continued to proceed ; and the governor, knowing that his violation of the cardinal's commands with regard to the strict confinement of De Blenau, might bring his head to the block, if sifted thoroughly, thought it best to abstain from irritating a person who not only possessed, but knew that he possessed, so much power. Not that he would not willingly have silenced the Woodman by some of those infallible means which were much resorted to in that day; but that he knew Chavigni was not easily satisfied on such points ; and thus being in a situation which is popularly expressed by "the horns of a dilemma," like a good Christian as he was, he chose rather to risk discovery than commit murder which would undoubtedly be found out. Under these circumstances, he permitted Philip and Pauline to proceed to the gates, and ordered the porter to give the young lady egress, taking care, however, to follow them all the way till they arrived at the last gate opening upon the drawbridge, which, at the time they arrived, had no' been yet raised for the evening. Pauline's heart beat with glad impatience as the Pauline's heart beat with glad impatience as the jailor put his key into the lock, whose bolt grating harshly, as it was withdrawn, produced to her ears most excellent music.

It so unfortunately happened, however, that at the moment the gate swung heavily back upon its hinges, Charles, the Woodman's son, presented himself for admission; and having before had free access to his futher, was proceeding calmly through the open door, without any notice of Mademoiselle de Besaucow whom he did not recognise in her disguise.

"What !" exclaimed the governor, whose Bastill habits rendered him quick to the slightest suspici-"do you not speak to your sister ?"

RIGHFLIED.

"Sister !" said the boy, confounded ; " I have no sister "

Pauline saw that in another moment all would be lost; and darting past the governor, she was through the gate, and over the drawbridge in a moment.

"Nom de Dieu !" cried the governor : " Follow her, Letrames !-- quick, quick !"

The turnkey was on Pauline's footstep's is a minute; but she had gained so much in the first instance, that she would certainly have ascaped with ease, if an envious stone had not obstructed her path at the bottom of the glacis, and stikking her foot, occasioned her to fall. Pauline utiered a scream of both pain and fear; and two steps would have brought the turnkey to the spot where she hay, when suddenly a small, strange-shaped figure in white, skipped over her prostrate form, and interposed between her and her pursue. "Venter Suint Gris !" cried the redeultable

"Ventre Saint Gris !" cried the redeultable Jacques Chatpilleur, cuisinier aubergistie, who thus came to her assistance—" You shall not touch her !" and drawing the long rapior that hung beside his carving-knife, he made a pass to near the breast of the turnkey, that the official started back tall ten paces, not knowing, in the dim light of the hour, what hobgoblin shape thus crossed his purpose. " Marmal " continued the abergiste, "Who are you that dare to injure this demoiselle 7 under the very walls of the Bastille, too, contrary to the peace and quiet of his majesiy's true subjects ? Get these gone ! or 1 will spit thee like a chopon de maine, or rather skewer thee like an ortolan under the wings."

This professional allusion, together with a momont's reflection, enabled Letrames, the tornkey, to call to mind the ancient vizandier; and slowering upon him a thousand harsh epithets for his interfarenc, he called upon him to stand aside, and let him secure his prisoner; still, however, standing aloof from the point of the weapon, - for Jacques Chatpillieur, while RICHE had shown that he could sword, as well as with his k to use Sancho's expression belly full of dry blows, as be with more dainty fare : with ever, that the drubbings he be In the present instance, h would not, know the turnkey ciferating to him to hold off, a with such reiteration, that for er had no opportunity of rehowever, he roared, rather th diable! you know me well trames, Géolier au château." The aubergiste looked over seeing that Pauline was no longe quietly put up his rapier, saying. mon ami, why did you not tell Je vous en demande mille pardo. the turnkey in his arms, he embrac a thousand excuses for having mis hugging him with a sort of mall which quite put a stop to his parsui The only benediction that the proper to bestow on the little aut housand curses, struggling all the imself from the serpent folds of mbrace. But it was not till the o pmpletely satisfied himself, that he ames to escape, and then very con red to assist him in the pursuit, wh ew would now be ineffectual. he darkness of the night had prete from being visible from the gates and Letrames, on his return to too wise to complain of the con-Chatpilleur : a vivandier at the e being much too convenient be guarrelled with upon triffe his absence, the wrath of turned upon Philip the woodman. "What is the meaning of this: Villain !" exclaimed he, "this is none of your daughter! Fourchard ! Le Heoterie !" he called aloud to some of his satellites----"quick ! bring me a set of irons ! we shall soon hear who this is, Monsieur Philip Grissoles !"

"You will never hear any thing from me more than you know already," replied Philip; "so put what irons on me you like. But you had better beware, Sir Governor; those that moddle with pitch will stick their fugers. You do not know what you may bring upon your head."

At the word the dark dangcon, Philip's courage had almost failed him, and it was not without an effort that he kept his stardy imbs fr. m betraying his emotion, while the jailors began to place the irons on his wrists and ankles: but when he heard the order to drive forth his son, he made a strong effort and caught the boy in his arms; God bless you. God bless you, Charles my boy 'and fear not for me," he exclaimed, " while there is a Power above."

It was a momentary solace to embrace his child, but the porter soon fore the boy from his aims, and pushing him through the gate, closed it after him, rejoicing that he should no more have to turn the key for any of the woodman's family. "Now," said he, "now we shall have no more trouble; I hate to see all our good old rules and regulations broken through. I dare say if his emigence the cardinal-God protect him '-were we fellow this Monsieur C have every thing out store of chains and iron get rusty for want of use " Peace, peace !" cried erie, take that feilow dow have the question to-more finds that so easy to bear. -A fool I was to be decen thing when she stammered name." So saying, he turn Letrames, who at that mot unsuccessful pursuit of Paul In the meanwhile, the ja moved with difficulty in his first and second court, and o the western tower, displayed steps leading down to the l this spot La Heuterie, who rank to his fellow-turnkey, light had brought with him at his co and descending to the bottom o up on high to let Philip see his woodman shuddered as he gloomy chasm which presented it by the glare of the torch, the light ing upon the wall in different pla green damp and ropy-slime, with definite limit to the dark and fearth he had no time to make any partical he second jailer, who stood at hi rced him on; and descending the ens, he found himself in a large lon th round stones, and filled with h in air, which at first made the tor took away the woodman's bre however, spread slowly through less, he could perceive three d which he conceived to give ent e under ground dungeons, is well as the fearful well were often applied, had given a terrific fame to the name of the Bastille, and rendered it more dreaded than any other prison in France.

During this time they had paused a moment, moving the torch slowly about, as if afraid that it would be extinguished by the damp, but when the flane began to rise again. La Heuterie desired his companion to bring the prisoner to number six, and proceeding to the extremity of the vault, they opened the farthest door on the left, which led into a low damp cell, cold, narrow, and unfurnished, the very abode of horror and despair. Into this they pushed the unortisnate woodman, following themselves, to see, as they said, if there was any straw. "Have you brought some oil with you ?" demanded La Heuterie, examining a rusty iron lamp that hung against the wall : "This is quite out."

"No, indeed," replied Fouchard, " and we cannot get any to-night: but he does not want it till day. It is time for him to go to sleep."

"No, no," rejoined the other, who seemed at least to have some human feeling; "do not leave the poor devil without light. Give him your lantern, man; you can fetch it to-morrow, when you come round to trim the lamps."

The man grumbled, but did as La Heuterie bade hims; and having fastened the lantern on the hook where the lamp hung, they went away, leaving Philip to meditate over his fate in solitude.

"I have brought it on myself at last," thought the woodman, as looking round him he found all the horrors he had dreamed of the Bastille more than realized; and his spirit sank within him. Cut. off from all communication with any human being, he had now no means of making his situation known; and the horrible idea of the torture shock all his resolution and unmanned his heart.

It would hardly be fair to pursue the course of his reflections any further; for if, when he me membered his happy cottage in the wood of Manus, and his wife, and his little ones, s momentar thought of disclosing all he knew crossed the woodman's mind; the next instant, the min of the queen, the death of the good Count de Blenau, and a train of endless ills and horrors to those who confided in him, flashed across his imagination and nerved his heart to better things. He called to mind every generous principle of his mature; and though but a humble peasant, he struggled nolyl against the dishonoring power of fear.

RICHELLEU.

Sleep, however, was out of the question ; and he sat mournfully on the straw that had been placed for his bed, watching the light in the lantern, as inch by inch it burned away, till at last it gleamed for a moment in the socket-sank-rose again with a bright flash, and then became totally extinguished. He now remained in utter darkness, and a thousand vague and horrible fancies crowded upon his imagination while he sat there, calculating how near it was to day, when he fancied that even the momentary presence of the jailer would prove some relief to the blank solitude of his situation. Hour after hour, however, passed away, and no glimpse of light told him it was morning. At length the door opened and the jailer appeared, bringing with him a fresh lighted lamp, thus offering a frightful confirmation of Philip's fears that the beams of day never penetrated to the place of his coulinement

The jailer took down the lantern, and having fastened the lamp in its place, gave to the unfortunate woodman a loaf of bread and a pitcher of water. "Come !" exclaimed Fouchard, in a tone which spoke no great pleasure in the task, "get up; I am to take off your irons for you : and truly, there is no great use of them, for if you were the dexid himself, you could not get out here."

"I suppose so," answered Philip. "But I trut that it will not be long before I am released all gether." "Why. I should guess that it would not," and continuing to unlock the irons; " people do not in general stay here very long."

"How so ?" demanded Philip, anxiously, misdoubting the tone in which the other spoke.]

"Why," replied he, "you must know there are three ways, by one of which prisoners are generally released, as you say, allogether; and one way is as common as another, so far as my experience goes. Sometimes they die under the torture; at other times they are turned out to have their head struck off; or else they die of the damp: which last we call being homesick." And with this very consolatory speech he bundled up the irons under his arm, and quitted the cell, taking care to fasten the door behind him.

CHAPTER III.

Showing what it is to be a day after the Fair, with sundry other matters, which the reader cannot fully comprehend without reading them.

HAVING now left the woodman as unhappy as we could wish, and de Blenau very little better off than he was before ; we must proceed with Pauline, and see what we can do for her in the same way.

It has been already said that in the hurry of her flight she struck her foot against a stone, and fell. This is an unpleasent accident at all times, and more especially when one is running: but Pauline suffered it not to interrupt her flight one moment longer than necessary. Finding that some unexpected obstacle had delayed her pursuer as well "erself, she was upon her feet in a moment;

these, Pauline found some one seize her) hind, and the next minute a large Spanish was thrown over her head, while a gigantic arms embracing her waist, raised her fro ground, and bore her along the street. Na conceiving that she was in the power of sc her pursuers from the Bastille, Pauline did ne ceive, in the dreadful spitation of the moment she was carried in a different direction ; and ing herself up for lost, she yielded to her fate out scream or cry. Whoever it was that he carried her like a feather; but after stridin through several turnings, he paused, place the ground, and still holding the cloud ad with one hand seemed to open that some one obstructed her pursuer, a have said before, to the Rue Saint An passed Jacques Chatipilleur's little aube any exchange of sentiment even with th Gourmand, and darted by the boutique of entier with the same celerity. The next s marchand de broderie et de dentelle, wil passage, or cul de sac, between it and the house, which was occupied by a brocand which trades requiring daylight in aid of th ations, were at that hour firmly closed with bar, nor shed one solitary ray to light the p along the streets. Just as she had come opposite to the leaving him to arrange his difference Chatpilleu in the best way he could towards the Rue Saint Antoine, with to thank her deliverer ; and, indeed, ing that the good aubergiste, taking a est in her fate, had, at the hoar appe at the door of his anherge till he saw Bastille, and then, from some undefine all would not go right, had watched and her safe out again. The interest not being reciprocal, forgotten all about the aubergiste; and the other. The next moment he raised her again, though in a different position, and carried her up what was evidently a small winding staircase, at the top of which he again opened a door, where, even through the cloak, Pauline could perceive that they had entered some place which contained a powerful light. The moment the door was open, some one exclaimed, "It is she ! Oh Jesu ! yes, it is she !" in a voice which sounded so like that of her maid Louise that Pauline was more than ever bewildered. The person who had carried her now placed her in a chair, and taking the addi-tional security of tying the cleak over her head, communicated for a few minutes with the other person in whispers; after which Pauline fancied that some one quitted the room. The covering was then removed from her eyes, and she found herself in a small, meanly-furnished apartment, whose only occupant, besides herself, was a handsome man of very gigantic proportions, and of that sort of daring aspect which smacked a little of the bravo. He was well dressed in a pourpoint of green lustring, braided with gold lace, slightly tarnished ; the haut de chausses was of the same, tied down the side with red ribands ; and the cloak which he removed from Pauline's head seemed to form a part of the dress, though he had deprived himself of it for the moment, to answer the purpose in which we have seen it employed. On the whole, he was a good-looking cavalier, though there was a certain air of lawlessness in his countenance and mien which made Pauline shrink,

RICHELIEU.

"Nay, do not be afraid, mademniselle." said he, with a strong Norman accent: "Point de danger, point de danger ;" and he strore to reasure her to the best of his power. He possessed no great eloguence. however, at least of the kind calculated to calm a lady's fears; and the only thing which tended to give Pauline any relief, was the maniset repect with which he addressed her, standing cap in hand, and reiterating that no harm was intended or could happen to her.

RICHELIEV.

She listened without attending, too much frightened to believe his words to their full extent, and striving to gain from the objects round about some more precise knowledge of her situation. She was evidently not in the Bastille; for the door of the room, instead of offering to her view bolts and bars of such complicated forms that, like the mousetrap, they would have puzzled the man that made them, was only fastened by a single wooden lock, the key of which, like a dog's tongue in a hot day, kept lolling out with a negligent inclination towards the ground, very much at ease in its keyhole. The more Pauline gazed around her, the more she was bewildered ; and after resolving twenty times to speak to the Norman, and as often failing in courage, she at last produced an articulate sound, which went to inquire where she was. The Norman, who had been walking up and down the room, as if waiting the arrival of some one, stopped in the midst, and making a low inclination, begged to assure mademoiselle that she was in a place of safety.

The ice being broken, Pauline demanded, " Did not I hear the voice of my maid Louise ?"

"No; it was my wife, mademoiselle," replied her companion, dryly; and recommencing his perambulations, the young lady sank back into berself. At length a tap was heard at the door, and the Norman starting forward went on the outside, closing it after him, though not completely; and of the conversation which ensued between him and some other man, Pauline could catch detached sentences, which, though they served bat vittle to elucidate her position to herself, may be service to the reader.

At first all was conducted in a whisper, but Norman soon broke forth, "Sachristie ! I tell she got in. I did not eatch her till she was

"Monseigneur will be precious angry with us both, answered the other. "How I missed you, I cannot imagine; I only went to call upon la petite Jeanette, and did not stay five minutes."

86

"And I just stepped into the Sanglier Gourmand," rejoined our Norman, "which is opposite you know. There I thought I could see all that went on. But that maraud, Jacques Chatpillieur, was always at his door about something; so finding that I could not get my second bottle of wine, I went down to the care for it myself; and she must have passed while I was below."

"How did you find out, then, that she had got into the Bastille ?" demanded the other.

The Norman's reply was delivered in so low a tone that Pauline could only distinguish the words —"Heard a scream—saw her running past like mad—threw the cloak over her, and brought her here."

"Perhaps she was not in, after all," rejoined the other; " but at all events, we must tell monseigneur so. You swear you caught her just as she was going in, and I'll yow that I was there and saw you."

A new consultation seemed to take place; but the speakers proceeded so rapidly, that Pauline could not comprehend upon what it turned exactly, although she was herself evidently the subject of discussion. "Oh, she will not tell for her own sake," said one of the voices. "She would be banished, to a certainty, if it was known that she got in; and as to the folks at the Bastille, be sure that they will hold their tongues." -

Something was now said about a letter, and the voice o' the Norman replied, "Monseigneur does not suppose that she had a letter. Oh, no ! trust me, she had none. It was word of mouth work, be you sure. They were too cunning to send a letter which might be stopped upon her. No, no, they know something more than that."

"Well, then, the sooner we take her there, w better," rejoined the other; "the carriage is betow, but you must blind her eyes, for she may know the liveries."

LICHELIEU.

"Ah ! your cursed livery betrayed us once before," answered the Norman. "Holla ! In haut! mon Ange. give me a kerchief; I will the her eyes with that, for the cloak almost smothers her, poor little soul!"

A light step was now heard coming down stairs, and a third person was added to the party without. What they said, Pauline could not make out; but though speaking in a whisper, she was still contident that she distinguished the voice of her maid Loonise. "Harm !" said the Norman, after a moment, "we are going to do her no harm, chere amic ! She will be down there in Maine, with the countess, and as happy as a princ ss. Give this genuleman the trunk mail, and get yourself rendy against I come back; for we have our journey to take too, you know, ma pelite frame."

The Norman now haid his hand upon the lock; there was a momentary bustle as of the party separating; and then entering the room, he informed Pauline that she must allow him to blindfold her eyes. Knowing that resistance was in vain, Pauline submitted with a good grace; and, her fears considerably allayed by the conversation she had overheard, attempted to draw from the Norman some further information. But here he was inflexible; and having tied the handkerchief over her eyes, so as completely to prevent her seeing, he conducted her gently down the stairs, taking oare to keep her from falling; and having arrived in the open air, lifted her lightly into a carrisge, placed himself by her side, and gave orders to wrive so.

The vehicle had not proceeded many minutes, when it again stopped; and Pauline was lifted out conducted up a fight of stone steps, and then it into an apartment, where she was placed in a fitevil, the luxurious softness of which bespoke as different soft of functions from that of the charwhich she had just left. There was now a little bustle, and a good deal of whispering, and then every one seemed to leave the room. Fancying herself alone, Pauline raised her hand, in order to remove the handkerchief from her eyes, at least for a moment; but a loud "Prenez garde!" from the Norman, stopped her in her purpose, and the next instant a door opened, and she heard steps approaching.

⁷⁶ Shut the doot," said a voice she had never heard before. "Marteville, you have done well. Are you sure that she had no conversation with any one in the prison ?"

"I will swear to it!" answered the Norman, with the stout asservation of a determined liar. "Ask your man Chauvelin, monseigneur; he was by, and saw me catch hold of her before she was at the gate."

"So be says," rejoined the other; "but now lower the room. I must have some conversation with this demoiselle myself. Whit for me withont."

"Pardie !" muttered the Norman, as he with drew ; "he'll find it out now, and then I'm ruined."

"Mademoiselle de Beaumont," said the person that remained, "you have been engaged in a rash and dangerous enterprise.—had you succeeded in it, the Bastille must have been your doom, and severe judgment according to the law. By timely information on the subject. I have been enabled to save you from such a fate; but I am sarry to say that, for the safety of all parties, you must endure an absence from your friends for some time."

He paused as if expecting a reply; and Pauline, after a moment's consideration, determined to ansurge, in order to draw from him, if possible; some farther information concerning the manner in which he had become acquainted with her movements, and also in regard to her future destination. "I perceive, sir," said she, " from your conversion that you belong to the same rank of society as myself; but I am at a loss to imagine hew any gentleman presumes to attribute dangerous enterprises, and actions deserving imprisonment, to a lady, of whom he neither does, nor can know any thing."

RECTIELIES.

"My dear young lady," replied her companion, "you make moments and the state of the state of the state have to put forth my diplomatic powers against so fair and worthful an opponent. But allow me to remind you that, when young ladies of the highest rank are found masquerading in the street at night, dressed in their servants' garments, they sobject their conduct, perhaps, to worse mise astructions than that which I have put upon yours. But, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, I know you, and I know the spirit of your family too well to suppose that any thing but some great and powerful motive could induce you to appear as you do now. Withdraw that bandage from your eyes (I have no fear of encountering them), and look if that be a dress in which Made moiselle de Beaumont should be seen."

Pauline's quick fingers instantly removed the bandkerchief, and raising her eyes, she found that she was placed exactly before a tall Venetian mirror, which offered her a complete portrait of herself, sitting in an immense arm-chair of green velvet, and disguised in the custume of a Languedoc paymente. The large capole, or hood, which she had worn, had been thrust oack by the Norman, in order to blindfold her eyes, and her dark hair, all dishevetled, was hanging about her face in glossy The red serge jupe of Louise had acconfusion. quired in the passages of the Bastille no inconsiderable portion of dust ; and near the knee on which she had fallen at the foot of the glacis, it was stained with mire, as well as slightly torn. In addition to all this, appeared a large rent at the side, occasioned by the efforts of Philip the woodman to dis engage it from the staple on which it had canging and the black bodice had been broadly marked green mould, in pressing against the wall while the guards passed so near to her.

BICHELIEU.

Her face also was deathly pale, with all the alarm, agitation, and fatigue she had undergone; so that no person could be more different from the elegant and blooming Pauline de Beaumont than the figure which that mirror reflected. Pauline almost stured when she beheld herself; buf quickly recovering from her surprise, she cast her eyes around the room, which was furnished in the most splendid and cosily manner, and filed with a thousand objects of curiosity or luxury, procured from all the quarters of the globe.

Her attention, however, rested not upon any of Within a few paces of the chair in which these. she sat, stood a tall elegant man, near that period of life called the middle age, but certainly rather below than above the point to which the term is generally applied. He was splendidly dressed, according to the custom of the day; and the neat trimming of his beard and mustaches, the regular arrangement of his dark flowing hair, and the scrupulous harmony and symmetry of every part of his apparel, contradicted the thoughtful, dignified expression of his eyes, which seemed occupied with much higher thoughts. Vandyke has transmitted to us many such a physiognomony, and many such a dress; but few of his costumes are more splendid, or his countenances more dignified, than was that of the stranger who stood beside Mademoiselle de Beaumont.

He pansed for a moment, giving her time to make what examination she liked of every thing in the apartment, and as her eye glanced to himselt, demanded with a smile, "Well, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, do you recollect me?"

"Not in the least," replied Pauline . " I think, sir, that we can never have seen each other before."

"Yes, we have, answered her companion," but it was at a distance. However, now look in that glass, and tell me-Do you recollect yourself?" "Hardly!" replied Pauline, with a blush, "hardly indeed."

""Well theu, fair lady, I think that you will no longer demand my reasons for attributing to you dangerous enterprises, and actions, as you say, deserving imprisonment; but to put an end to your doubts at once, look at that order, where, I think, you will find yourself somewhat accurately described." And he handed to Pauline a small piece of parchment, beginning with the words of serious import 'De par le roy,' and going on to order the arrest of the Demoiselle Pauline, daughter of the late Marquis de Beaumont, and of the Dame Anne de la Matukier, with left no room for mistake or quibble, even if it had been examined by the eyes of the sharpest lawyer of the Cour des Aides.

"What say you new, Mademoiselle de Beaumont ?" demanded her companion, seeing her plunged in embarrassment and surprise.

"I have nothing to say, sir," replied Pauline, "but that I must submit. However, I trust that, in common bumanity, I shall be allowed to see my mother, either when I am in prison, or before I am conveyed thither."

"You mistake me," said the other; "you are not going to a prison. I only intend that you should take a little journey into the country; during the course of which all attention shall be paid to your comfort and convenience. Of course, young lady, when you undertook the difficult task of conveying a message from the queen to a prisoner in the Batille, you were prepared to risk the consequences. As you have not succeeded, no great punchment will fall upon you; but as it is absolutely necessary to the government to prevent all communication tary absence from the court, till puch time as whole business be terminated; for neither the queen, nor any one else, must know how far you have succeeded or failed."

RICHELLEU

Pauline pleaded hard to be allowed to see her mother, but in vain. The stranger was obdurate, and would listen to neither entreaties, promises, nor remonstrances. All she could obtain was, the assurance that Madame de Beaumont should be informed of her safety, and that, perhaps, after a time, she might be permitted to write to her. "Listen to me," said the stranger, cutting short the prayers by which she was attempting to influence him. "I expect the king and court from Chaptilly within an hour: and before that time you must be out of Paris. For your convenience, a female servant shall attend you, and you will meet with all the respect due to your rank; but for your own sake, ask no questions, for I never permit my domestics to canvass my affairs with any one-nay, they are forbidden ever to mention my name, except for some express and permitted purpose. I will now leave you, and send Mathurine to your assistance, who will help you to change your dress from that coffre. You will then take some refreshment, and set out as speedily as possible. At the end of your journey, you will meet with one to whose care I have recommended you, and you will then learn in whose hands you are placed. At present I have the honor of bidding you farewell."

The uncertainty of her fate, the separation from her mother, the vague uncasy fear strendard upon want of all knowledge of whither she was going, and the impossibility of communicating with her friendy, under any event, raised up images for more terrifying and horrible to the mind of Pauline, than almost any specific danger could have done; and, as her, companion turned away, she hild her face in her hands and wept.

Hearing her sob, and perhaps attributing her team to other motives, he turned for a moment, and sold in a low voice : " Do not weep my dear child ?

give you my honor, that you will be well and kindly treated. But one thing I forgot to mention. I know that your object was to visit the Count de Blenau 3 and 1 know, also, that a personal interest had something to do in the matter. Now, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, I can feel for you 3 and it may be some comfort to know, that M. de Blenau has, at least, one person in the council, who will strive to give to the proceedings against him as much leniency as circumstances will admit."

This said, he quitted the apartment, and in a moment after Pauline was joined by the female servant of whom he had spoken. She was a staid, reputable looking woman, of about fifty, with a little of the primness of ancient maidenhood, but none of its acerbity. And, aware of Pauline's rank, she assisted her to disentangle herself from her uncomfortable disguise with silent respect, though she could not help murmuring to herself. " Mon Dieu! Une demoiselle mise comme ca." She then called the young lady's attention to the contents of the coffre. asking which dress she would choose to wear; when, to her surprise, Pauline found that it contained a considerable part of her own wardrobe. Forgetting the prohibition to ask questions, she could not help demanding of Mathurine how her clothes could come there ; but the servant was either ignorant, or pretended to be so, and Pauline could obtain no information. As soon as she was dressed, some refreshments were placed on the table by Mathurine, who received them from a servant at one of the doors, which she immediately closed again, and pressed Pauline to eat. Pauline at first refused ; but at length, to satisfy her companion, who continued to insist upon it with a degree of quiet, persevering civility, that would take no relusal, she took some of the coffee, which was at that time served up as a rarity. As soon as ever the dome tic perceived that no entreaty would induce her taste any thing else, she called in a servant to c

RICHELIEC.

the coffre to the carriage, and then notified to Pauline that it was time for them to depart.

Pauline felt that all resistance or delay would be vain: and she accordingly followed Mathurine down a magnificent staircase into a court-yard, where stood a chaise routante, the door of which was held open by the Norman we have already mentioned, while two men-servants appeared ready mounted to follow the vehicle, as soon as it set out. Mathurine placed herself by Pauline's side when she had entered; and the Norman, having closed the door, opened the porteresofters of the court, and the carriage drove out into the street.

We will not take the trouble of following Mademoiselle de Beaumont on her journey, which occupied that night and the two following days :-suffice it to say, that on the evening of the second day they arrived in the beautiful neighbourhood of Chateau du Loir. The smilling slopes, covered with the first vines; the rich fruit trees hanging actually over the road, dropping with the latest gifts of liberal nature ; the belamy air of a warm September evening; the rosy checks of the peasantry ; and the clear, smooth windings of the river Loir," all announced that they were approaching the land of happy Touraine : and after putting her head more than once from the window, Mathurine, with a smile of pleasure, pointed forward, exclaiming, " Voild & Chdteam."

Pauline's eyes followed to the point where the other's hand directed them; and upon a high ground, using gently above the trees which crowned a little projecting turn of the river, she beheld a group of towers and pinnacles, with the conicalslated roofs, uralifarious weathercocks, long narrow windows, one turnet upon the back of another, and all the other distinctive marks of an old Traucha chiltens.

BICHELING

CHAPTER IV.

In which De Blenau finds that he has got the rod in his own hand, and how he uses it; together with a curious account of a tremendous combat and glorious victory.

I CAN easily imagine myself, and I dare say the reader will not find much difficulty in funcying, that the Count de Blenau suffered not alittle inquietude while he remained in uncertainty respecting Pauline's free exit from the Bastille.

Take and draw him, as Sterne did his captive. See him walking up and down the chamber with the anxiety of doubt upon his brow and in his heart, listening for every sound in the court-yard, catching the foot-step of the sentinel at his door, and fancying it the return of the governor,—hope struggling against fear and fear remaining victor,—conjuring up a thousand wild, improbable events, and missing the true one; and in short, making his bosom a hell wherein to torment his own heart.

Thus d'd Claude de Blenau, during that lapse of time which the governor might reasonably be supposed to be occupied in the daties of his office. But when a longer time passed, and still no news arrived of Pauline's escape, the uncertainty became to great for mortal endurance; and he was about to risk all-by descending into the court through the terret, when the challenge of the sentinel announced the approach of some one, and in the next moment the governor entered the room, his pale features flushed with anger, and his lip quiveries, with ill-subdued rage.

"Monsieur de Blenau !" said he, in a tone that he had never before presumed to use towards but wealthy prisoner, " here is something wrom There has been a woman in the prison to-nig passing for that rancal woodman's daughter : an am given to understand, that she has brought either letter or message to you. But I will ascertain the truth-By Heaven! I will ascertain the truth!"

"Have you detained her, then !" exclaimed De Blenau, losing all caution in his fears for Pauline.

"Oh, ho! Monsieur le Comte," said the governor, fixing on him his keen and angry eye; "then you do know that she has been here? But do you know, sir, that it may cost me my head ?"

" Very possibly, if you tell any body," replied De Blenau; who by this time had recovered his selfpossession, and had, upon reconsideration, drawn from the governor's speech a different conclusion from that which he had formed at first; feeling sure, that if Pauline had not escaped, his anger would have taken a calmer form. "Listen to me. Sir Governor," continued he, firmly, after having determined in his own mind the line of conduct which he ought to pursue ; " let us deal straightforwardly towards each other, and like friends as we have hitherto done. We are both in some degree in each other's power. On your part, do not attempt to entrap me into any acknowledgment. and I will show you that I will not make use of any advantage you may have given me-"

"I do not understand your meaning, sir," cried the governor, still angrily : "I have given you no advantage. By Heaven I will have the apartment searched —ay, sir, and your person too."

"Will you so ?" replied de Blenau, coolly drawing frôm his bosom the queen's billet, and approaching the edge to the lamp so that it caught fire. The governor started forward to seize it; but the strong arm of the count held him at a distance, till the few lines the queen had written were irretrievably destroyed; and then freeing him from his grasp, he pointed to a chair, saying. "Now, Monsieur le Gouverneue, sit down and listen to a few words of common sense." The governor placed himself in the chair with a look of bitter malignity; but this wolleneed down gradually into an expression of thoughtful cunning, as De Blenau proceeded-"Thus stands the case," said the count ; "I was committed to your charge, I think, with positive orders not to allow me communication with any person whatsoever-was it not so ? The governor assented : "It so happened, however," continued the count, with a smile, " that at our very first interview, you conceived a friendship for me of the most liberal and disinterested nature" (the governor bit his lip), " a sort of love at first sight : and, for the sake of my accommodation, you not only broke through the positive commands of the cardinal prime minister, in suffering me once to have communication with another person, but allowed such to take place at all times, according to my pleasure; and also took especial pains to procure the attendance of the person I wished, paying him with my money, for which, and other excellent purposes, you have, within the space of six days, received from me upwards of one thousand crowns."

RICHELIKU.

The governor winced most desperately; and fully convinced, that a tale so told, would readily convey his head under the axe of the executioner, if it reached the ears of Richelieu, he cursed himself for a fool, De Blenau for a knave, and Philip the woodman for something between the two; most devoutly wishing both the others at the devil, so he could slip his own neck out of the halter.

De Blenau, without much skill in reading the mind's construction by the face, easily divined what was passing in his companiou's bosom; and perceiving him to be much in the situation of a lame dog, he resolved still to apply the lash a little, before he helped him over the still. "Well, Sir Governor," continued he; now we will suppose, as a mere hypothesis to reason upon, that, through this sery liberty which your disinterested kindness bas allowed me, I have-received those commany cations from without which it was the cardina great object to prevent. How ought you to under such circumstances ? Ought you to the stera, unrelenting Richelieu, and say to hi 'May it please your eminence, I have intention and wilfully broken through every order you, me—I have taken the utmost pains that they ab not be observed; and I have so far succede thwarting your designs, that Monsieur de Ble from whom I have received one thousand ero and from whom I expect a thousand more the ment he is liberated—I say, that this good fi of mine and your enemy, has gained all the i mation which you wished to prevent. "—This w be a pretty confession of faiths"

De Blenau paused, and the governor bit his but after a moment, he looked the count full in face. and replied, "Perhaps it might be the way."

De Blenan, however, was not to be deceived saw terror in the deadly hue of the governor's cheek, and the anxious rolling of his sunken and he went on-" Perhaps it might be the way-to have your head struck off without de for what would your confession avail the cars now, after the mischief is done ?-Would it no bet'er to say to yourself - Here is a young no man, whom I believe to be innocent-for who have a regard-whom I have served already. who is both willing and able to reward any one does serve him ; and who, lastly, will never be me. let happen what will. Under these cire stances, should I not be a fool of the first wate inquire into a matter, the truth of which I am unlikely to discover, and which, if I do, it wi my duty to disclose : whereas, standing as the fair does now, without my knowledge in the l my ignorance makes my innecence, and I betra one. Even supposing that the whole be found I am no worse than I was before, for the story but be told at last ; while, if the count be liber which most likely he will, instead of losing t fice, or my head, I shall gain a thousand cro indemnify me for all the trouble I have have ment is all on one side. Even if there we to know, you would be a fool to inv where you must of necessity be your or where all is to be lost, and nothing ca ed,n " You argue well, Monsieur de Blenau ed the governor, thoughtfully ; "and you ing would be convincing, if it extended circumstances of the case. But you do n one half;-you do not know, that Chaviga whose eyes nothing seems hidden knew girl's comi g, and sent me an order to deta. which that sottish fool the porter never go till she had escaped-how am I to get over "Then, positively, she has escaped ?" demi De Blenau. " Yes, yes, she has escaped " replied the go or, pettishly : " you seem to consider nothing pr ; but, jet me tell you, Monsieur de Blon man and man, where you are bound to speak your suspicions as well as your knowledge. No person has come to the gate of the prison asking any thing concerning me; and so answer Chavigni."

"But the porter, Monsieur de Blennu," said the officer, anxiously,—" he may peach. All the other dependents on the prison are my own, placed by me and would turn out were I to lose my office; but this porter was named by the cardinal himself. —What is to be done with him ?"

"Oh! fear not him," answered De Blenau; "as his negligence was the cause of your not receiving the order in time to render it effectual, your silence will be a favor to him."

"True! true!" cried the governor, rubbing his hands with all the rapture of a man suddenly relieved from a mortal embarrassment: "True! true! I'll go and bully him directly—I'll threaten to inform the cardinal. Chavigni, and the whole council; and then—when he begins to fancy that he feels the very rope round his meck.—I'll relent, and be charitable, and agree to conceal his mistake, and to swear that the lady never came.—How will Chavigni know ! She will never confess it herself, and at that hour it was too dark for any one to watch her up to the gates.—Morbleau! that will do precisely."

"I see little or no danger attending upon it," said the prisoner; " and, at all events, it is a great deal better than conveying your neck into the noose, which you would certainly do by confessing to Richelieu the circumstances as they have occured."

"Well, well, we will risk it, at all events," replied the governor, who, though not quite free from apprehension respecting the result, had now regained his usual sweet complacency of manner. "But one thing, Monsieur de Blenan, I am sure you will promise me; mamely, that this attempt shall never be repeated, even if occasion should occur; and[for the rest—with regard to your never betraying me, and other promises which your words imply, I will trust to your honour."

RICHELIEL

De Blenau readily agreed to what the governor required, and repeated his promises never to disclose any thing that had occurred, and to reward his assistance with a thousand crowns, upon being liberated. Mindful of all who served him, he did not forget Philip the woodman ; and deeply thankful for the escape of Pauline, was the more anxious to ascertain the fate of one who had so greatly contributed to the success of her enterprise.

"Speak not of him ! speak not of him !" exclaimed the governor, breaking forth into passion at De Blenau's inquiries. " This same skilful plotter attends upon you no longer. You will suffer some inconvenience for your scheme ; but it is your fault, not mine, and you must put up with it as best you may."

"That I care not about," replied De Blenau. "But I insist upon it that he be treated with no severity. Mark me, Monsieur le Governeur: if I find that he is ill used, Chavigni shall here of the whole business. I will risk any thing sooner than see a man suffer from his kindness for me."

"You paid him well, of course," said the governor, drawing up his lip, "and he must take his chance. However do not alarm yourself for him : he shall be taken care of—only, with your good leave, Seigneur Comte, you and he do not meet again within the walls of the Bastille.—But in the name of Heaven! what clatter i this at the door ?" he exclaimed, starting from his chair, at a most unusual noise which proceeded from the staircase.

The governor, indeed, had good reason to be astonished; for never was there a more strange and inconsistent sound heard within the walls of a prison, than that which saluted their ears. First came the "Quiwire?" of the sentinel; to which a voice roared out "Lediable!" Qui wice?" cried the sentinel ago in a still sharper key. The answer to this was thing but a clatter, as the governor had expressed such as we might suppose produced by the blo up of a steam-kitchen: then followed the discharge of the sentirel's frelock; and then sundry blows given and received upon some hard and sonarous substance, mingled with various oaths, executions, and expletives then in use among the lower classes of his Christian majesty's lieges making altogether a most deatening din.

At this sound the governor, as little able to conceive whence it originated as De Blenau himself, drew hissword, and throwing open the door, discovered the redoubtable Jacques Chatpilleur, cuisinier aubergiste, striding in triumph over the prostrate body of the scattinel, and waving over his head an immense stew.pan, being the weapon with which he had achieved the victory, and through which appeared a small round hole, caused by the ball of the soldier's firelock. In the mean while was to be seen the sentinel on the ground, his iron morion actually dented by the blows of his adversary, and his face and garments bedabbled, not with blood, indeed, but with the poulet an bianquette and its white sauce, which had erst been tenant of the stew-pan.

"Victoria! victoria! victoria!" shoted the aubergiste, waving his stew-pan ; "Twice have I conqured in one night ! Can Mielraye or Bouillon say that ? Victoria ? victoria !" But here his triumph received a check ; for looking into the unhappy utensil. he suddenly perceived the loss of its contents, which had flown all over the place, the treacherous lid having detached tself during his conflict with the sentinel, and sought safety in flight down the stairs. " Mon poulet ! mon poulet ! exclaimed he, in a tone of bitter despair, ' le nid y est, mais V oiseau est. parti,-the nest is there, but the bird is flown, Helas, mon poulet ! mon pawere poulet !" and ouitting the body of his prostrate foe, he advanced into the apartment with that sort of zigzag motion which showed that the thin sinewy shanks which supported his woodcock-shaped upper man, were somewhat affected by a more than usual quantity of the generous grape. The whole scene was so inexpressibly indictous that De Blennu burst into an immoderate fit of laughter, in which the governor could not help joining, notwithstanding his indignation at the treatment the sentinel had experienced. Recovering himself, however, he poured forth his wrath upon the aubergists in no measured terms, demanding how he dared to conduct himself so in the royal château of the Bastille, and what had become of the Count de Blenau's supper, adding a few qualificatory epithets, which may as well be omitted.

" Ehbien, monsieur ! Eh bien !" cried the aubergiste, with very little respect for the governor; "as for the gentleman there, lying on his belly, he ought to have let me in, and not fired his piece at me. He knew me well enough. He might have cried Qui vice? once,-that was well, as it is the etiquette."

"But why did you not answer him, sacre maraud?" cried the governor.

"I did answer him," replied the other, stoutly. "He cried Qui vive ? and I answered Le diable, car le diable vive toujours. And as for the supper, I have lost it all. Je l'ai perdu entre deux matins. The first was a greedy Norman vagabond, who feeds at my auberge ; and while I was out for a minute, he whips me up my matelot d'auguille from out of the casserole, and my dinde piquée from the spit. and when I came back five minutes after, there was nothing left but bare bones and empty bottles. Pardie ! And now I have bestowed on the head of that variet a poulet en blanquette that might have comforted the stomach of a king. Oh Dieu ! Dieu ! mes malheurs me finiront jamais. Oh ! but 1 forgot," he continued, " there is still a fricandeau a l'oseille with a cold pate that will do for want of a better.-Monscigneur, volre serviteur," and bowed five or six times to De Blenau ; Monsy le Gouverneur, votre tres humble, " and bowing rou and round to every one, even to the sentinel, this time was beginning to recover his feet, ubergiste staggered governor by the promise of the fricandeau, but not, however, without being threatened with punishment on the morrow.

CHAPTER V

The bureau of a Counsellor of State, or how things were managed in 1642

"Marteville, you have served me essentially," said the Count de Chavigni as soon as he had left Pauline in what was called the ladies' hall of the Hotel de Bouthilliers, addressing the tall Norman, whom the reader has already recognised beyond a doubt. "You know I never suffer any good service to go without its reward ; therefore I will now pay you yours, more especially as I have fresh demands to make upon your zeal. Let us see how our accounts stand ;" and approaching a small table, which served both for the purposes of a writing-desk and also to support a strong ebony cabinet clasped with silver, he drew forth a bunch of keys and opened a draw plated with iron, which contained a quantity of gold and silver coin. Chavigni then seated himself at the table, and the Norman standing on his right-hand, they began regularly to balance accounts, the items of the Norman's charge being various services of rather a curious nature.

"For stopping the archduke's courier," said Chavigni " and taking from him his despatches-fifty crowns is enough for that."

"ldemand no more," said Marteville; "any common thief could have done it."

"But, by-the-way, I hope you did not hurt him, for he came with a safe conduct."

"Hurt him ! no," replied the Norman : " we are the best friends in the world. When I met him on the road, I told him civilly that I must have his despatches; and that I would either cut his throat or drink a bottle with him, whichever he liked; so he chose the latter, and when we parted, he promised to give me notice the next time he came on the same errand."

RICHELLEU.

"The rascal!" said Chavigni, "that is the way we are served. But now we come to this business of the Count de Blenau-what do you expect for the whole concern 1"

"Nay but monseigneur, you forget, "-exclaimed the other; "there is one little item before that. Put down,-for being an astrologer."

"Why, I have given you fifty crowns on that account already," rejoined the statesman; "you are exorbitant, Seigneur Marteville."

"That fifty crowns went for my expenses—all of it," replied the other. "There was my long black robe all covered with gimcracks; there was my leathern belt, painted with all the signs under heaven; there was my white beard, and wig, which cost me teu good crowns at the shop of Jansen the perquier; seides the harness of my horse, which was mnde to suit, and my astrologer's bonnet, which kept all fast upon my head. Now, monseigneur, you cannot give me less than fifty crowns, for being out two nights, and running the risk of being burnt alive."

"I think not, " said Chavigni, " so let that pass. But to come to the other business."

"Why first and foremost," replied the Norman, marking each article as he named it, by laying the index of his right hand upon one of the immense fingers of his left,—"For making love to mademoiselle's maid."

"Nay, may, may " cried Chavigni, " this is too much. That must be part of the dower I have premiised with her, of which we will talk presently." have you married her ?!"

"No," answered the Norman, " not yet.

Chavigni's check reddened, and his brow knit into a heavy frown. "No evasions, sir. I commanded you, when you took her away last night from Chantilly, to marry her directly, and you agreed to do so. Why is it not done ?"

"If the truth must be told, monseigneur, it is not done, because it goes against a Norman gentleman's stomach to take up with anybody's cast-offs."

"Do not be insolent sin" cried the statesman, "Did 1 not give you my honour that your suspicion was false 7 Know, sin, that though Chavigai may sometimes condescend to converse with you, or may appear to trifle for a moment with a girl hke this Louise, it is merely to gain some greater object that he does so, and that unless it be for some state purpose, he never honours such beings with his thoughts."

"Well well, mouscigneur," replied the other, seeing the fire that flashed in his lord's eye, "I will marry her: Foy de Normand! Don't be angry; L will mary her."

"Foy de Normand ! will not do," said Chavigni, "It must be this very night."

"Eh bine! eh bine! soil," cried the Norman, and then muttered to himself with a grin, "I've four, wives now living; a fifth won't make much difference."

"What murmur you, sir ?" demanded the statesman. "Mark me! in one hour from hence you will find a priest and two witnesses in the cardinal's chapel ! When you are married, the priest will give you a certificate of the ceremony, carry it to my intendant, and upon the sight of it he will pay you the sum we agree upon. Now, proceed with your demands."

"Well then, monseigneur," continued Marteville, "what is the Information concerning mademoiselle's coming to Paris worth ?"

"It is worth a good deal," replied Chavigni," and will always pay more for knowledge of that shirt than any acts of brute force. Set that down for a hundred crowns, and fifty more for catching the young lady, and bringing her here; making altogether two hundred and fifty."

"Yes, sir, yes; but the dot-the dowry you mentioned," cried the Norman. "You have forgot that."

"No. I have not," replied Chavigni. "In favor of Louise I will make the sum up one thousand crowns, which you will receive the moment you have married her."

"Oh! I'll marry her directly, if that be the case." cried the Norman. "Morbleau! that makes all the difference."

"But treat her kindly," said Chavigni. "With the stipend of a thousand crowns, which I allow you yearly, and what you can gain by particular services, you may live very well; and perhaps I may add some little gratification, if you please me in your conduct towards your wife."

"Oh! I'll be the tenderest husband living," cried the Norman, since my grafification depends upon hers. But I'll run and fetch her to be married, directly, if you will send the priest, monseigneur."

"Nay, stop a moment," said the statesman. "You forgot that I told you I had other journeys for you to take, and other services to perform."

" No, sir," answered the Norman, "all is prepared to set out this very night, if you will tell my errand."

Chavigni paused for a moment, and remained in deep thought, gnawing his lips as if embarrassed by doubts as to the best manner of proceeding. "Mark me, Marteville," said he at length: "there are two or three sorts of scoundrels in the world, among whom I do not look upon you as the lenst." The Norman bowed with the atmost composure, we well aware of the place he held in Chavign's op on. "There are, however, some good points ab ou," continued the statesman; at which Marte bowed again "You would rob, kill, and plunder. I believe, without remorse, any one you hate 'se did not care about; but I do not think you would forget a kindn as or betray a trust."

68

" Never !" said the Norman : " red hot pincheze will not tear from me what is intrusted to my honour."

"So be it, then, in the present instance," said Chavigni ; " for I am obliged to give you the knowledge of things, and to enter into explanations with you, which I do not often do with any one. You must know, then. I have information that on the same day that Monsieur de Cinq Mars set out from Chantilly with Monsieur de Thou, the Duke of Orleans, with Montressor and St. Ibal, took their departure from Moulins, and the Count de Fontrailles from Paris. They all journeyed towards the same point in Champagne. I can trace Fontrailles to Troves, the duke and his companions to Villeneuve. and Cinq Mars and De Thou to Nogent, but no All this might be accidental, but there are farther. croumstances that create suspicion in my mind. Cinq Mars, when he set forth, gave out that he went to his estate near Troyes, in which I find he never set his foot ; and when he returned, his conference with Louis was somewhat long. It might have been of hawks and hounds, it is true ; but after it, the king's manner both to the cardinal and myself was cold and haughty, and he suddenly took this resolution of coming to Paris himself to examine into the case of the young Count de Blenzu : in short, I suspect that some plot is on foot. What I require of you then is, to hasten down to Cham-pagne ; try to trace each of these persons, and discover if they had a conference, and where ; find out the business that brought each of them so far, examine their track as you would the slot of a deer, and give me whatever information you collect; employ every means to gain a thorough knowledge of all their proceedings-force, should it be requir--but let that is the last thing used. Here is this signet, upon the signet of which all the agents of government in the different towns and villages will communicate with you." And be drew from his firger a small seal ring, which the Norman consigned to his pocket, his hands being somewhat too large to admit of his wearing it in the usual manner.

RICHELIEV.

"The Duke of Orleans and his pack I know well," answered Marteville, " and also Cinq Mars and De Thou: but this Count de Fontrailles—what like is he, monseigneur ?"

"He is a title ugly mean looking man." replied Chavigni; "he frequently dresses himself in gray, and looks like a sorcerer. Make him your first object; for if ever there was a devil of cunning upon earth, it is Fontrailles, and he is at the bottom of the plot if there be one."

"You traced him to Troyes, you say, monseigneur ? Had he any pretence of business there ?"

"None," answered Chavigni; "my account says that he had no attendants with him, lodged at the Aubergeidu Grand Soleil, and was poorly dressed."

"4 will trace him if he were the devil himself," said the Norman; "and before I see you again, monseiguear, I shall be able to account for each of these gentry "

" If you do," said Chavigni, " a thousand crowns is your reward; and if you discover any plot or treasonable enterprise, so that by your means they may be foiled and brought to justice, the thousand shall grow into ten thousand, and you shall have a place that will give you a life of luxary."

The Norman's eyes sparkled at the anticipation, and his imagination portrayed himself and his five wives living together in celestial harmony, drinking the best vintages of Burgundy and Epernay. existing the best vintages of the fat of the land, and simplified like mad. These blissful ideas were first interview like mad. These blissful ideas were first interview "Hark " cried Chavigni, " they are patting horses to the carriage ; go down and see that all be prepared for the young lady's journey."

"Instantly," answered the Norman, " and after that I will carry Louise to the priest, finger your lordship's cash, and we will set off for Troyes."

"Do you intend to take her with you 1" demanded Chavigni, in some surprise.

"Nay, my lord, you would not wish me to leave my bride on our wedding night, surely," replied the Norman, in a mock sentmental ione. "But the truth is, I think she may be useful. Womm's wit will often find a way where man's wisdom looks in yain; and us I have now, thanks to your bounty, two good horses, I shall e'en set Louise upon one of them, and with the bridle rein over my arm lead her to Brie, where, with your good leave, we will sleep, and thence on upon our journey. Travelling with a woman, no one will suspect my real object, and I shall come sooner at my purpose."

"Well, so be it then," answered the statesman." Yon are now, as you wished to be, intrusted with an affair of more importance than stopping a courier, or carrying off a weak girl; and as the reward is greater, so would be the panishment in case you were to betray your trust. I rely on your honor; but let me hint at the same time, that there is such a thing as the rack, which has more than once been applied to persons who reve I state secrets. Keep good account of your expenses, and such as are truly incurred for the government the govern meat will pay."

Thus ended the conference between Clavigni and the Norman, neither of whom we shall follow much farther at present. Of Chavigni it is only nuccessary to any, that immediately after the departure of Paoline, he proceeded to the Louvre to wait the arrival of Louis the Thirteenth, who soon after entered Paris, accompanied by the queen, Cinq dars, and all the usual attendants of the court, and flowed by the cardinal and those membors of the council who had not previously arrived along with Chavigni,

RICHELIZU.

In regard to the Norman, inspired by the agreeable prospect of a thousand crowns, he was not long in visiting the chapel of the Palais Cardinal, where the priest speedily united him to a black-eyed damsel that he brought in his hand. Who this was, it does not suit me to discover to the reader. If he have found it out already, I cannot help it; but if he have not, I vow and protest that in the whole course of this true history I will afford him no farther explanation; no, not even in the last sentence of the last page of the last volume.

Immediately after their marriage the Norman put his bride upon horseback and proceeded to Brie, each carrying behind them a valise, containing a variety of articles which would doubtless greatly edify the reader to learn, but which unfortunately cannot now be detailed at full length, the schedule having been lost some years after by one of their collateral descendants in the great fire of London, where it had found its way in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes. All that can be affirmed with certainty is, that in the valise of the Norman were three shirts and a half with falling collars, according to the fashion of that day : a pourpoint or doublet of blue velvet (which was his best), and a cloak to match ; also (of the same stuff) a haut-de-chausses, which was a machine then used for the same purpose as a pair of breeches now-adays; and over and above all the rest was his antrologer's robe and gray beard, folded round a supernumerary brace of pistols, and a small stiletto, Into the lady's wardrobe we shall not inquire : sufnce it to say, that it accompanied its mistress wafe from Brie to Troyes, where, putting up at the Grand Soliel, the Norman began his perquisition concerning Fontrailles.

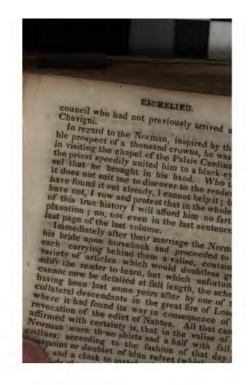

RICHELIED.

CHAPTER VI

Showing how a great minister made a great mistake ...

STRANGE to say, in the manuscript notes from which this true history is derived, there occurs the most extraordinary omission that perhaps ever appeardd in the writings of any one pretending to accuracy ; and, most provoking of all, I have searched. memo rs and annals, histories and letters, state papers and private memoranda, and have consulted all sorts of tradition, oral and written, without being enabled to supply from any other source the neglect of the original historian. Who would believe, that, after having interested the reader so deeply in the character of Jaques Chatpilleur, Cuisinier Aubergiste, the writer of the above-mentioned notes would be so inconsiderate, so stupid, so disappointing, as not to say one word concerning the farther progress of the redoubtable vivandier on that : night, wherein he achieved the two famous victories recorded in a preceding chapter. But so it is : instead of giving us a pathetic account of the scanty supper he at length contrived to furnish forth for the noble prisoner, or of satisfying our curiosity in regard to the means he employed to appease the wrath of the governor, the notes skip over the farther proceedings of that entire night, and bring us at once upon the Count de Blenau's levee the next morning; entering into very minute details concerning the difficulties he encountered in arranging his mustaches, buttoning his pourpoint, &cc., without assistance; all of which I shall pass over as contemptible and ir elevant, and below the dignity of authentic history.

With the emharrassment of the Coupt, de Blanaus mind we have something more to do; and, to tell the truth, the more he reflected upon his situation, the more he was puzzled in regard to his fitua-

ing to do with it."

De Blenau's lip curled with contempt. "I think you ought to know before this time," answered he, "that I am not likely to betray any one. But there seems a noise and bustle in the court, in all probability caused by the arrival of the cardinal. Go and receive him, and depend upon me." Of all the misfortunes on the earth, thought De Blenau, the curse of cowardice is the most dreadful.

In a few minutes his supposition respecting the arrival of the cardinal was confirmed by asummons to appear before the council, in the hall of audience; and with his mind still undecided, he followed the officer across the court to the scene of his former examination. A difference, however, struck him in the present arrangements of the prison, from those which he had before remarked.

The court, instead of being crowded by those over s who had the liberty of walking in it, war

1. and, fixed like marble on eacl

to the audience-hall we

RICHELLEU.

pillars that supported the roof, was occupied by a body of the cardinal's guard : in the chair at the heau of the table sat the king himself, with the prime minister on his right hand : Chavigni, Bouthilliers, Mazarin, and others occupied acars on either side ; and to complete the array appeared several clerks, together with the officers of the prison, leaving only the space of about three feet at the bottom of the table, which remained clear for the prisoner to present himself opposite the throne.

Extraordinary as it was for the king himself to sit. upon the examination of a state prisoner, the whole demeanor and conduct of the monarch had undergone a change since the return of Cing Mars, which astonished those about him more than even his resolution to be present at the council held that morning in the Bastille. Even those who were most accustomed to watch the changes of the king's variable disposition, would hardly have recollected in the sovereign, who, with the easy dignity and self-possession of a clear and intelligent mind, presided at the head of the council-table, the same man who in general yielded his very thoughts to the governance of Richelieu, and abandoned all his kingly duties to one whom he appeared both to dislike and dread. But so it was, that, stimulated by some unseen means, Louis seemed at once to have resumed the king ; and as soon as 'De Blenau entered the audience-hall, he at once opened the business of the day himself, with all those powers which his mind really possesed when called into activity.

"Monsieur de Blensu, suid the king, "we are glad to see you. We have heard much of you, and that always a good report from those that we love, and therefore our confidence in your honour and the tegrity is great. There will be various questions asked of you to-day, by the members of the correct present, which must affect the welfare of the war dom, and our own personal happiness; and to the questions we command you, as a good subject an honest man, to answer truly, and according to your conscience, without any reservation whatsoever."

RICHELIEC.

Before entering the audience-hall, De Blenau, well knowing that every careless word might be subject to misconstruction, had determined to speak as little as possible : and therefore, merely answering the king's speech by a profound inclination of the head, he waited in silence for the questions to which he had alluded.

Richelieu, the keen searching glance of whose eyes had been fixed upon him during the whole time, paused for a moment in expectation of a reply; but seeing that he snid nothing, the minister proceeded himself. "I have heard with astonishment, Monsieur de Blenau." said he, " that you have lately refused to answer questions, to which you had before replied in conversation with me ; and I can conceive no reason, sir, why you should object to give satisfaction on these points one day as much as another."

"Nor can I conceive," replied De Blenau, " any reason why your eminence should cause questions to be put to me again which I had before answered; and that reiteration even while the replies were yet new in your mind."

" My memory might want refreshing." answered the cardinal; " and you must also remember, that the circumstances were very different at the two periods in which those questions were addresse to you. In the first place, you spoke merely in conversation; in the second case, you were a prisoner, and it was therefore necessary that your deposition should be taken from your own mouth. But all this is irrelevant. The council is not inclined to take notice of your former contumacy, provided you now reply to what shall be asked you."

De Blenau was again silent, merely, bowing to signify that he comprehended, without pledging himself either to answer or not; and Richelien proceeded with his questions, placing his hand, did so, upon a large packet of open letters which lay on the table before him.

RICHELIES.

⁷⁰ You have already informed me, Monsieur de Blenau, if I remember rightly," said the minister, "that you have, at various times, forwarded letters for the queen, both by the usual public conveyances and otherwise."

The king fixed his eyes intently upon the count, while he replied at once, "I have done so !"

"Can you remember," continued the cardinal, "during what period you have been accustomed to send these letters for the queen? I mean of what date was the first I"

"I cannot precisely at this moment call to mind," answered De Blenau, "but it was shortly after your eminence appointed me.or rather recommended me, to the office of chamberlain to her majesty."

"You see, sire," said Richelieu, turning to the king with a meaning glance, "just before the taking of Arras by the Imperialists-"

"Exactly so, your eminence; I remember it by a circumstance that occured at the time," interposed De Blenau, misdoubting the effect of the cardinal's comments.

Richelieu gave him a gracious smile for this confirmation of his remark. " Pray, what circumstance was that, Monsieur de Blenau ?" demanded he ; but his smile was soon clouded by the count's reply...

"It was, that the lace lappets, in order to procure which hor majesty wrote that letter to Brussels, were seized at Arras, that city having fallen into the enemy's hands. The queen was much grieved thereat. You, know, monseigneur, ladies set great store by their apparel."

Chavigni smiled, but Richelieu's brow gathered into a heavy frown, and his reply was in that deep hollow tone of waice, by which alone one could distinguish when he was affected by any powerful reading. His brow at all times remained calm, excert when he sought to awe or intimidate; his event was under command, scanning the passions of ers, and expressing none of his own, but those which he himself wished to appear: but his voice betrayed him, and when internally agitated, it would sink to so low and cavernous a sound, that it seemed as if the dead were speaking. It was in this tone that he answered De Blenau.

"The contents of that letter, sir, are but too well known by their effects. But I am to conclude, from your observation, that you are as well aware of what the queen's letters have contained, as the persons to whom they were addressed."

"Not so, your eminence," replied De Blenau. "The import of that letter I happened to be acquainted with by accident, but I pretend to no farther knowledge."

"Yes, yes, sir," said Richelieu. "it is very evident that you know well to be informed or not on any subject, as it suits your purpose."

^{ie} Nay, Monsieur le Cardinal,ⁿ interposed the king, "I think the young gentleman answers with all candour and discretion. We do not seek to perplex him, but to hear the troth; and sure i am that he will not discredit his birth or honor by provarication."

" Your majesty's own honorable mind does justice to mine," replied the count ; "I will own that I am guarded in my speech; for surrounded by those who seek to draw matter from my mouth, on which to found some acquisition against me, I were a fool to speak freely. Nevertheless, I will answer truly to whatsoever I do answer: and if there should come a question to which I cannot reply without as I have done before, refuse to answer, and the consequences of my honesty be upor my own head." "Well, sir," said the cardinal, "If you have done the harangue with which you are edifying the council, I will proceed with my questions; but first let me tell you, that I am not disposed to be dated with impunity. I think you denied to me that you had ever forwarded any letters to Don Francisco de

RICHELINU

Mello, Leopold Archduke of Austria, or Philip King of Spain.—Beware what you say, Claude Count de Blenau !"

"If I understand your eminence rightly," said the prisoner, "you do not ask me whether I ever did forward such letters, but whether I ever denied to you that I did forward them : in which case, I most reply that I did deny having expedited any letter to Bon Francisco de Mello, but the two other names I never touched upon."

"Then you acknowledge that you have conveyed letters from the queen to the archduke and the king of Spain ?" demanded Richelieu.

"I have made no such acknowledgment," answered De Blenau; "your eminence puts a forced construction on my words."

"In vain you turn, sir, like a rebellious scrpent that strives in its windings to escape the hand that grasps it. At once I ask you, have you or have you not, ever by any means, expedited any letter from the queen, or other person, to either the architeke of Austria, or the king of Spain 1. This, sir, is a question that you cannot get over !"

The eyes of the whole council fixed upon the count as the cardinal spoke. De Blenau paused for a moment to recollect himself, and then addressed himself directly to the king. " As a good and faithful subject, he said, " there is a great duty which I owe your majesty, and I believe I have always performed it as I ought ; but as a servant of your royal consort the queen, I have other duties, distinct, though I hope in no degree opposed to those which bind me to my king. As a man of honour also, and a gentleman. I am bound to betray no trust reposed in me, whether that trust seem to me material or not; and though I feel sure that I might at once answer the questions proposed to me by his cuite nence of Richelieu without any detriment or dis credit to her majesty, yet so sacred do t hold confidence of another that I must decline to ref whaterer be the consequence. However, in server you, sire, that no word or deed of her mojesty the queen, which has ever come to my ears, has been derogatory to your majesty's dignity, or contrary to your interest."

"Then I am to conclude that you refuse to answer ?" said Ri hink, Monsieur de Blenau, burne ir obstinacy too far."

bstinacy," repli-

f what is due to bown me that it form your emi-

" My conduct d

ed De Blenn

my honour:

is her majes

nence of al. ...

er affairs, from

"Be the consequence on your own head then, young man," exclaimed the cardinal. "We will now break up the council .- Monsieur de Blenau, take leave of the sun, for you never sce another morrow !!!

De Blenau's courage was unshaken, but yet a cold chilly feeling gathered round his heart as Richehey bade him take leave of the sun, and rose to break up the council. But still the king kept his scat, and Chavigni, hastily writing a few words on a scrap of paper, handed it to the cardinal, who, after reading it, appeared to think for a moment, and then again addressed De Blenau. "There is one hope still left for you, sir : did Monsieur de Chavigni understand you rightly, that if you had the queen's command to confess what you know of her affairs, you would answer the questions we put to von ?"

De Blenau breathed freely. " Undoubtedly," replied he : "my honour will then he satisfied, and there will be no subject on which I shall have a reserve."

"What will you consider a sufficient expression of her majesty's commands to that effect ?" asked Chavigni; "I know that his eminence wishes freat you with all possible lenity, although the mere command of the king in council ought to be sufficient warrant for you to yield any information that may be required."

"We think differently on many points, Monsieur de Chavigni," answered De Blenau; " but if you can show me her handwriting to any order, or if one of the officers of her household will bear me a message from her majesty to deliver what hittle I know of her affairs, I will do so without furt'er hesitation."

There was now a momentary consultation carried on in a low voice among the various members of the council, apparently concerning which of the queen's attendant's should be sent for; but at length Chavighi whispered to the cardinal, "send for La Rivie e; he is a friend of Lafemas, and will do any thing he is bid."

"If Monsieur de La Rivière bear you the queen's commands, will you be satisfied, Sir Count 1" demanded Richelieu.

"The queen's gentleman-usher," said De Blenau ; "most assuredly; that will be sufficient."

"Go yourself, Chavigni," whispered Richelieu, "and as you come, tell him what to say,—we will wait his arrival:" he proceeded aloud—"but see, Monsieur de Chrvigni, that he communicates with the queen, and be fully informed of her wis'es."

De Blenau smiled, convinced from his late information through Pauline that the queen was sill at Chantilly, and therefore that though La Rivière might be himself at Paris, and ready to swear any thing that the cardinal dictated, he could have no communication with Anne of Austria, unless, what seemed improbable, she had returned to the capital with the king.

As soon as De Chavigni had retired for the parpose of seeking La Rivière, Richelieu ran his eye over some memoranda, as if about to put further fuestions to De Blenau; but the king, not noticip hese indications of his purpose, addressed risoner himself "Well, Monsieur le Comp said he," while Chavigni is gone, there are two or three points on which I shall be glad to speak with you."

RICHELLEU.

Richelieu was surprised, and not particularly delighted, thinking that the king was about to continue the examination himself, which might not be conducted precisely in such a manner as to -DIG duce the effect he wished ; but, in the independent mood with which Louis was affected, he dered not, with all his daring, attempt to interrupt the course of his sovereign's proceedings, and therefore remain d silent, watching the opportunity of interposing, to give what turn he best could to the interrogatory that appeared about to commence. In the meanwhile De Blenau bowed his head, calmly prepared to bear the mental torture of a long crossexamination, where every word might be subject to dangerous miscoustruction.

⁶⁰1 understand, Monsieur De Bleaau, continued the king, while the whole council listened with attentive expectation—⁶⁰ I understand that you have the best breed of boar-dogs in France. Pray are they of the Pomeranian or the Exol race ?—and how can they be procured ?!"

Richelien bit his lip; but to De Blenau the king's question was like the clearing away of a threatened storm; and habitually attached to the chave, as well as deeply learned in all its mysteries, he was delighted to find that Louis turned the conversation to a subject equally familiar to both.

"Mine are the true Pomeranian breed, sire," he roplied;" flewed an inch deep, with eyes like Sandarak-would light your majesty home at night, if by chance you lost your way. In truth, they are only fit for a movarch; and Cing, Mars has now four couple of the best in education for your majesity, which, when well trained, and recovered from their wilderness, he will present to your majesty in my name; and I humbly hope that you will accept them in aid of your royal sport."

"We shall, we shall ; and thank you well, S

Count," replied the king, smiling most graciously at the prospect of possessing a breed which he had been long seeking for in van. "Monsieur le Cardinal, do you hear that? We will bont with them some day. You used to hunt in your day too; have you quite given it over ?"

"I have been too much busied, sire," answered Richehee, gravely, "in hunting from your majeaty's dominions Huguenot wolves and Spanish foxes, to pursee other game."

Louis turned from him with an uneasy shrug, expressive of fully as much distaste for Richelieu's employments as the statesman experienced for his : and once more addressing De Blenau, he plunged deep into the science of hunting hawking, and fowling; giving the young count a thousand receipts, instructions, and anecdotes, which he listened to with the most reverential deference, not only in as much as they proceeded from his sovereign, but also as coming from the most experience ed sportsman of the age.

In the mean while, Richelieu was fain to employ himself in writing notes and memoranda, to allay the spleen and irritation that he felt at what he internally termed the king's weak triffing; till at length he was relieved by the return of Chavigui, bringing with him the queen's usher. La Rivière,

De Blenau well knew that this person, who was by birth unjust within the rank of a gentleman (which word was then in France one of great significance), had been placed in the service of Ann of Austria for the purpose of acting as a spy upon her, from Richelieu's fear of her correspondence with Spain; but informed as the count now was, of the queen's wishes, it was perfectly indifferent to him who appeared on her belialt; his unly soject being, that his mistress's commands, publicly expressed, should, in the minds of all, free this from the imputation of having betrayed her. La Rivière booked round him, as he existent

naw. The cardinal then proceeded. "Have you majesty the queen since Momfeur de Chaormed you of the wiskes of the council !" "I have, may if please your emissiones," rep

Rivière, in a tremulous voice.

And what was her majesty's reply to our ast?" asked Richelien. "Speak boldly !' led, in a tone only calculated to reach the eusher, who stood close beside him, and shi inly, by his hesitating manner, that he was the influence of alarm. The cardinal, how ributed this to a wrong cause, thinking the ributed this to a wrong cause, thinking the ributed this part, as prompted by Chav that in all probability he would spoil it b itation.

ust as La Riviére was proceeding to an wever, Chavigni, who had taken his plac council-table the moment he enterod, and in writing rapidly since, conveyed a slip of across to the cardinal, who raised his fant usher to be silent while he read. The w ich his friend had written greatly discomp minister's plans. They were, 'I am afra 1 not succeed : I have seen the queen; not only told La Rivière, at once, to cor count, in her name, to answer every of calated to, her. but has given him a lett her own hand to that effect. She is either innocent, or relies devotedly on De Blennu; whicheyer is the case, her open conduct will clear her in the mind of the king. Act as you like."

RICHELIED

"What is the matter, Monsieur le Cardinal ?" demanded Louis, somewhat impatiently. "Why do we not proceed ?"

"Because," answered 'Richelieu, "what Monsieur de Chavigni says is right, sire, though, I confess, it did not strike me before. Shall we not become coatemptible in the eyes of the world, by submitting to be dictated to by Monsieur de Blanau? And is it not a gross insult to your majesty's power, to obey the commands of the queen, when he has refused to obey your own? I am sorry that this did not appear to me earlier; but the objection now seems to me so forcible, that I can proceed no farther in this course."

Louis paused. He was as jealous of the queen possessing any authority as Richelieu could wish ; but in the present instance he was urged, by different motives, in an opposite direction. Some sparks of affection had arrived in his boson towards Anne of Austria, and he wished much to satisfy himself regarding the suspicions which had been urged against her. De Blenau was the dear friend of his favourite Cinq Mars; and his mind also had begun to yield to the arguments of those who sought the destruction of the minister. But, on the other hand, the habit of being ruled by Richelieu, and the specious arguments he produced, made Louis heatate '---" what, then do you intend to do 1" demanded he, addressing the cardinal.

"In the first place, sire," replied Richelieu, sternly, I propose to interrogate the prismer once more, and if his contumney still continues, let the question be his doom."

The king's naturally good feelings and love of justice here at once overcame all doubt. " No God forbid !" cried he, rousing himself to enem "What, are we Christians, Monsieur to Cardi and shall we put a fellow-oreature to the torture, when there is a straight-forward way to gain the information, that we want ? Fie upon it ! No !!"

RICHELLEL

Richelieu's ashy cheek grew still a shade paler. It was the first time for many a year he had undergone, rebuke. He left that the transmels with which he had so long held the king enthralied were but as green lithes twined round the limbs of a giant. He saw that the vast fabric of his power was raised upon a foundation of unsteady said, and that even then it trembled to its very base.

"Monsieur La Rivière, answer the king !" continued Louis, in a dignified tone. "What says the queen to the request of our council, that she would command her chamberlain to answer those queations, in regard to which he has a scruple on her account !'

"Her majesty says, sire, answered La Rivière, "that she is most willing to do any thing that will please your majesty; and she has not only ordered me to command, in her name. Monsieur de Biepau to inform the council of every thing he knows concerning her conduct; but has also written this letter, with her own hand, to the same effect." And advancing to the table, he bent his knee before the king, and presented the document of which he was the bearer.

Louis took the letter, and read it through. "This looks not like a guily conscience," said he, frowning upon Richelieu. "Give that to Monsieur de Blenau, he continued, to one of the officers. "There, Sir Count, is your warrant to speak freely ; and though wa think you carry your sense af honor too far, so as to make it dangerous to yourreff, and almost rebellious towards us, we cannot help respecting the principle, even though it be in attems."

"May I always have such a judge as your majesif "replied De Blenau. "Most humbly do I crave yo ur royal pardon, if I have been at all wanting in dui y towards you. Believe me, siro, it has proceed.

RICHELIED.

ed not from any fault of inclination, but from an error in judgment. I have now no farther hesitation, all my duties being reconciled ; and, I believe, the best way fully to reply to the questions which have been asked me, will be by telling your majesty, that I have on several occasions forwarded letters from the queen, by private couriers of my own, or by any other conveyance that offered. None of these letters have been either to the archduke, to Don Francisco de Mello, or any other person whatever, connected with the Spanish government, except her majesty's brother, Philip, King of Spain, to whom 1 have assuredly sent several ; but before 1 ever undertook to do so, her majesty condescended to give me her most positive promise, and to pledge her royal word, that the tidings she gave her brother should on all occasions be confined to her domestic affairs, nor ever touch upon the external or internal policy of the government, so that my honour and allegiance should be equally unsullied. These letters have sometimes remained upon my person for weeks, waiting for the fit opportunity to send them ; which circumstance having by some means been discovered, has caused me no small inconvenience at times. Farther I have nothing to tell your majesty, but that I have ever heard the queen express the greatest affection for your royal person, and the warmest wishes for your public and private welfare; and on my honor, I have never observed her do, by word or action, any thing which could be construed into a breach of the duty she owes your majesty, either as her sovereign or her husband.

"You see !" exclaimed the king, turning to Richetien, as De Blenau concluded ; "You see-exactly what she confessed herself-not one taxte of exference."

The anger of the cardinal, at finding himself foil, ed. swept away his political prudence. tritage and weakened by a wearing disease, he was in frame of mind to see calmly a scheme he had for ed with infinite care, so completely overthrown; and forgetting that the king's energies were now aroused to oppose him, he resolved to let his vengeance fall on the head of De Blenau as the means of his disappointment. His brow darkened and his eye flashed, and he replied in that stern and haughty manner which had so often carried command along with it.

"If your majesty be satisfied, of course so am 1, whose, sole wish was to purge the lify crown from the profiging touch of strangers. But as for Monsieur de Bienau, he has confessed himself guilty of a crime TiPle short of high treason, in fowarding those letter, to a foreign enemy. We have already condemned a woman to exile for a less offence; and therefore the mildest sentence that the council can pronounce, and which by my voice it does pronounce, is, that Claude Count de Bienau be banished for ever from these realms; and that, if after the space of sixteen days he be found within their precincts, he shall be considered as without the pale of law, and his blood be required at the hand of no m in that sheed it ""

There was an indignant spot glowing in the king's face while Richelieu spoke thus, that Chavigni marked with pain; for he saw that the precipitant haste of the minister was hurrying his power to its fall.

"Too much of this !" cried Louis, angrily. "Lord Gardinal, you forget the presence of the king. Monsieur de Bienau-We, by our royal prerogative, do annul and make void the sentence you have just heard, merely commanding you to retire from this chatteau of the Bastille, without holding communication with any persons attached to the court, and to render vangelf within the limits of our province of Bourdon, and there to wait our further pleasure. The council is over," he continued, riving. "Monsieor le Cardinal de Richelieu, by sending the warrant for the count's release some time in the day to our governour of the Bastille, you will merit our thanks."

The officers cleared the way for the king-the huissiers of the chamber threw wide the doors-and Louis with a firm and dignified step, proceeded slowly out of the hall, followed by Richelieu, who thunderstruck and confounded, kept his eyes bent upon the ground, in the silence of deep astonishment. The rest of the council, equally mute and surprised, accompanied the cardinal with anxiety in every eye ; while the officers of the Bastille and the Count de Blenau remained the sole occupants of the hall of audience.

CHAPTER VII.

In which De Blenau gets out of the scrape

THE silence that reigned in the audience-hall of the Bastille after the scene we have described, endured several minutes, during which each person who remained within its walls, commented mutely on the extraordinary events he had just witnessed. De Blennu's feelings were of course mingled, of surprise at the king's unusual conduct, and gratification at his own deliverance. The governor's thoughts were differently employed, looking forward to the fall of Richelien, speculating in regard to his successor, and trying to determine who would be the best person to court in the changes that were likely to ensue. "Like master, like man," say the adage ; and the inferior officers of the prison . compliance therewith, calculated upon the remain al of the governor as a consequence of the rain the minister who had placed him there, and laid their own minor plans for securing their places.

RIGHELIEB

De Blenau was the first to break silence. "Well, my friend," said he, addressing the governor, "I am to be your guest no longer, it seems; but be assured that I shall not forget my promises."

⁴⁴ You are infinitely good, monseigneur," answered the other, bowing almost to the ground. "I hope you will believe that I have gone to the very extreme of what imy duty permitted, to afford you all convenience."

"I have no doubt of it," replied the count ; " but let me ask, what has become of my good friend, Philip the woodman ? He must not be forgotten."

The knowledge of the severity he had exercised towards poor Philip, in the first heat of his anger, now called up a quick fluch in the pale check of the governor; and he determined to shelter himsell from the resentment of his late prisoner, by telling him that the woodman had been liberated.

In those dangerous times, the acuteness of every one was sharpened by co tinual exercise; and De Blenu's eye, fitting on the varying countenance of his companion, soon detected that there was so rething amiss, by the alteration which his question produced. "Monsiear le Governeur," said he, "give me the truth. I promise you that every fining shall be forgotten, provided you have not seriously injured him; but I must know that the man is sale who has served me so faithfully."

"The fact then is this, monseigneur," replied the governor; "thinking it best for all parties, I ordered this monsieur Philip Grissoles to be confined till after your examination to-day, lest any thing might transpire that could injure you & me."

"You thought of yourself alone, sir," answered De Blennu, somewhat hitterly; ' but see that he be restored to that degree of liberty which you were ordered at first to permit, or you will hear more of

As he spoke, the door of the audience-hail, communicating with the outer court, was thrown open so suddenly as to make the governor start a pace back, and Chavigni entered the room with a countenance, from which all his efforts could not baaish the anxiety of his mind. Naturally quick and impatient, it often happened that his long training in the school of political duplicity did not suffice to overcome the struggles of his original disposition ; and even the violent effort to conquer the native earnestness and impatience of his character would sometimes produce more visible marks of its working than if he had suffered his passions to take their course. In the present instance, his fine features were drawn and sharpened by the attempt to drive from them any expression of his feelings, and his eye flashed with ill-subdued fire, as he irritated himself with a thousand conjectures concerning the latent movers of the recent occurrences. On entering, he pointed with his hand towards the door for the governor to leave them ; and seeing that he did not immediately obey, he exclaimed in no very placable voice, " Begone ! 1 wish Monsieur de Blenau's company alone,-What do you wait for ? Oh, there is the order for his liberation. -Ther :, take your pack with you." And he pointed to the lower officers of the prison, who thus dismissed quickly followed the governor as he shrunk away from the statesman's hasty and irritable glance.

"Monsieur de Blenau," said Chavigni, as soon as the door was closed, "it was not worth while to detain you here for an hour or two, till such time as the order could be sent for your emancipation; I therefore drew it out in the lodge, —Bat you owe me nothing for that;" he continued, seeing that De Blenau was about to thank him for the supposed service. "I made it an excuse to stay behavior order to seek an answer to a question or two. Not I make no pretence of asking you these question as a friend, for I know that you consider mean such; but I do it merely on my own account, wishing for information on some points regarding which you alone can satisfy me. It is your business, therefore, to consider before you answer, whether so to do be for your interest or not. The only thing I will promise, which I do honestly, is, not to let your replies go beyond my own breast."

"The method of your address is certainly extra ordinary Monsieur de Chavigni," replied De Blenau: " but however we may differ on many points, I give you credit for so much f ankness, that I believe you would not betray even your emeny if he relied on you: neither do I know, or rather recollect, at this moment, any question I should hesitate to answer. Therefore propose what you think fit, and I will satisfy you, or not, as suits my convenience." "Between you and me, Monsieur de Blenau, there is no need of fine w rds. I have always found you strickly honourable, and therefore I rely on what you tell me, as if it were within the sc pe of my own knowledge. In the first place, then, you have been witness to an extraordinary scene to-day. Are you at all aware from what cause the king has acted as he has done, so at variance with his conduct for fifteen years ?"

"Particularly, I am aware of no cause, and can only conjecture that his majesty is tired of being dictated to by his servant ?"

"Umph !" said Chavigni, în a tone of dissatisfaction; " there is no need to triumph, Monsieur de Blenau. Am I to believe that you know of no one who has instigated the king to take such singular steps in your favour !"

"Of none whatever," answered the count; "onless it were her majest: the queen,-the effect of any application from whom would be quite different, I should conceive."

"No, no. no !" said Chavigni. "It was not on her that my suspicions rested. I must have been mistaken. One word more. Have you had any late communication with Monsieur de Cinq Mars."

BIOMELIEU.

"About three weeks ago I wrote to Germain, sending some young bounds service; but that was long before I finding my way hither."

"I must have been mistaken." repen "I thank you, Monsieur de Blenau. a whim of the kin 's own-God grant the humour will soon pass." "And now sir." said De Blenau, " 1 swered your questions, there are one or on which you might give me satisfacti inclined to do so ?"

"It I can, without injuring myself) disclosing any plan that I am desirous replied the statesman.

" My questions shall regard the past future," said De Blenau; "and are int to gratify my own curiosity. In the fir I once saw you at St. Germain, in with a demoisell attached to Mademois mont-to what did your buisness with

"I did not think you had seen us," vigni. "I might answer that I was and probably you thought so as well as self; but my conversation referred to that she had been present when Segui brought the news of your having been the qu en : and from her also I learne he made use of to let her know that lost the packst which you had upon wood of Mantes."

"Monsieur de Chavigni," said De more cordiality in his manner than he u ed towards the statesman, " the work aware of your domestic happiness for suspect you of degrading yourself to a thack you for your candour. Now teb man, called Philip the woodman, in my account 7 and why is he so?" "He is," replied Chavigni, " and this-he happened to recommed and attacked you a servant of mine, and was fool enough to tell it abroad, so that it reached the king's ears. Now, though every thing is justifiable in the service of the state. I did not particularly wish that buisness investigated, and I therefore put Monisteur Philip in here to keep him out of the way for a time. Yu are now of course aware why you were attacked It was to secure the papers on your person, which papers we supposed were part of a treatonable correspondence between the queen and the Spanish government. All that is now over; and therefore, if you will promise me not to a stir the buisness of that affray in any way-which indeed would do you no good--this meddling woodman shall have his liberty."

" I never had the slightest intention of stirring it," replied De Bleanu; " and therefore rest satisfied on that score. But at the same time I must tell you that the whole affair came to the king's ears through me, and not through the woodman, I believe. I observed your servant, as well as he did, and did not fail to write of it to several of my friends, as well as speak of it openly an more than one occasion; and this, depend upon it, has been the mrans by which it reached the ears of the king, and not by poor Philip."

"Then I have done lim wrong," snid Chavigni, " and must make him some amends. Let me see. Oh, he shall be sub-lieutenant of the forest; it will just suit him. And now, Monseigneur de Bienau, as a friend, let me give you one piece of advice. This 'country is in a troubled and uncertain state, and there will be, doubleds, many plois and cahals going on. Retire, as you are commanded, into Bourbor; and if any one attempt to lead you into any compiracy, so far from acceding, do not even listen to them; for the Cardinal owes you something for what has hoppened to day. Tal he is not one to forget such debts. The eye of an angy minis upon you !--so be as guarded as if you trod among vipers. The time will come when you will say that Chavigni has advised you well."

RICHELITEL

"And it is certainly advice which I shall follow, both from reason and inclination. But let me askam I to consider the king's prohibition strict in regrant to communicating with any one at the court ?"

Chavigni thought for a moment, and De Blenau imagined that he was considering the circumstances under which Louis's command had been given ; but it was not so. The mind of the statesman rapidly reverted to Pauline de Beaumont, all his precautions with regard to whom turned out to be nugatory; and he now calculated the consequences which were likely to ensue under the present state of affairs. He had no fear, indeed, in regard to the responsibility he had taken upon himself; for it would be easy to prove, in case of investigation, that Pauline had attempted in disguise to communicate privately with a state prisoner in the Bastille, which would completely justify the measures he had pursued; but he wished on all accounts to let a matter drop and be forgotten which had already produced such disagreeable events, and he therefore determined boldly to inform Madame de Beaumont of what had been done, and the motives for doing it ; and then-certain that for her own sake she would keep silence on the subject-to restore her daughter with all speed.

Though the thoughts of Chavigni were very rapid in combination, yet all these considerations occupied him so long, that De Blenau, perceiving his companion plunged into so profound a revery, took the liberty of pulling him out by the ear, repeating his former question, whether he was to consider the king's prohibition in regard to communicating with the court as strictly to be observed.

"Undoubtedly !" replied Chavieni: " beyond all question ! You do not want to get into the Basfille again, do you ? Oh! I perceive it is Makero oiselle de Beaumont you are thinking of Boity car not see her. She is neither in Paris not a

RICHELIED

Germain, but I will take care that when she joins her mother in Paris, she shall be informed of your safety; and you can write yourself when you get into the Bourbonnois."

The reader, who is behind the scenes, may probably take the trouble of pitying De Blenau for the anxiety he would suffer on hearing that Pauline was neither at St. Germain nor in Paris; but there is no occasion to distress himself. De Blenau, know ing that Pauline had absented herself from the court for the purpose of conveying to him the spistle of the queen, naturally concluded that Chavigni had been deceived in regard to her absence, and that she was at all events in safety wherever she was.

In the mean time Chavigni proceeded. "You must of course go to St. Germain, to prepare for your journey; but stay ven there as few hours as you well may. Remember, I have told you, the eye of an angry man is upon you '-To-day is yours -to-morrow may be his-take care that by the least imprudence you do not turn your sunshine into storm. That you may make all speed, I will lend you a horse; for I own I take some interest in your fule--I know not wny--it shall be at the gates in an hour, together with an order for the woodman's liberation; so now, farewell. I have wasted too much time on you already."

With this speech, half kind, talf rude Chavigni left De Blenau. Whether the statesman's motives were wholly friendly, or whisther they might not be partly interested, proceeding from a nice calculaof the precarious state both of the cardinal's health and of his power, weighed with the authority the queen might gain from the failure of either, the count did not stay to investigate, although a suspicion of the latter kind flashed across his mind. In this, however, he did Chavigni injustice. In: fatural character he was not unlike De Blecan himfelf, frank, honourable, and generous; but character tion is stronger than nature; and education had made them different beings.

HIUHELIEU.

On the departure of the statesman, the count returned once more to the apartment he had occupied while a prisoner, with no small self-gratulation on the change in his situation. Here he bused himself in preparations for his departure, and took pains to ascertain that the paper written by the unhappy Caply still remained in the book, as well as that the file was yet in the position which it described. Having finished this examination, which he looked upon as a duty to the next person destined to inhabit that abode, he waited impatiently till the hour should be passed which Chavigni had named as the time likely to elapse before the horehe promised would be presented.

Ere it had flown much more than half, however, the governor entered the chamber, and with many profound bows and civil speeches, informed him that Monsicur de Chavigni had sent a horse for his use, and an order for the immediate liberation of Philip the woodman. De Blenau was gratified by Chavigni's prompt fulfillment of his word in this last respect; and remembering the thousand crowm which he had promised the governor on his liberation, he placed them in his hands, which brought him very user to the end of the large sum of gold that his value contained.

Now De Blemau was perfectly well convinced that the governor was as great a rogue as need be ; but there is something so expansive in the idea of bring liberated from prison, that he could not bear the thought of keeping his louis shut up in a bag any longer, and he porced them forth into the governor's path with as much satisfaction as if he was commercipating so many prisoners himself.

An ven courant was worth, in that day, about three france, and a louis d'or somewhat about four and inventy (more or less, according to the depreciation) so that eight ecus or crowns, went to the louis, a consequently, the sum of one thousand con-amounted very nearly to one hundred and twentyfive golden louis, which was a very pretty reward for a rogue to receive for being a rascal in a good cause: nevertheless, the governor, even when he had safely clutched the promised fee, looked very wistfully at a little green silk bag, which De Blenau reserved in his left hand, and which he calculated must contain about the same sum, or more.

RICHELIEL

The count, however, held it first; and having given directions to whom, and when, his baggage was to be delivered, he descended into the inner court, and cast his eyes round in search of his faithful friend Philip. But the woodman had received at once his emancipation from the dungeon where we last left him, and the news that De Blennu was free ; and though he lingered in the court to see the young count depart, with something both of joy and pride in his feelings, yet there was a sort of timid delicacy in the peasant's mind, which made him draw back from observation, amid the crowd of p isoners that the court now contained, the moment that he perceived the governor, with many a servile cringe, marshalling the late prisoner towards the gate of the Bastille ; while those less fortunate persons, still destined to linger out their time within its walls, stood off with curious envying looks, to allow a passage for him now freed from their sad fellowship. De Blenau, however was by no means forgetful of the woodman, and not perceiving him among the rest, he inquired where he was of the obsequious governor, who instantly vooiferated his name till the old arches uchoed with the sound. " Philip ! Philip the woodman ! Philip Grissoles 1" cried the governor.

"Does he know that he is free altogether to return home ?" demanded De Blenau, seeing him approach.

"No, I believe not," replied the governor. "A bad the henor of waiting first upon your lordship."

Philip now came near, and De Bleasu had the gratification of announcing to him, unforestalled, that the storm had blown over, and that he min now return to his cottage in peace. He also told him of the appointment with which Chavigni proposed to compensate his imprisonment-an of so elevated that the gayest day-dreams of Philip's ambition had never soared to half its height. the joy of returning to the bosom of his family, to the calm shelter of his native forest, and the evan tenor of his daily toil, swallowed up all his feeling a throne would not have made him happier ; and the tears of delight streaming down his rough cheek, brought a glistening drop too into De Blenau's eye. Noble and aristocratic as he was, De Blenau felt the there was an aristocracy above all-the nobility of virtue; and he did not disdain to grasp the broad hand of the honest [woodman. "Fare you well, Philip" he said " Fare you well, till wemeet again. I shall not easily forget you."

RICHELLED.

The woodman felt something more weighty in his plan than the hand of De Blenau, and looked at the heavy green purse which remained in it with a hesitating glance. But the count raised his finger to his lip with a smile. "Not a word," said he, "not a word, as you value my friendship." And turning round, he followed the governor through the various passages to the outer court, where stood Chavigni's horse caparisoned for his journey. De Blenau sprang into the saddle with the lightness of recovered freedom. The heavy gate was thrown open, the drawbridge fell, and striking the sides of his horse with his armed heel, the newly emancipated prisoner bounded over the clattering boards of the pontleve, and with lightened heart took the road to St. Sermain.

His journey was soon made, and, as he approached the place of his destination, all the well-known objects round about seemed as if there shone upon them now s brighter and more beautifying son that when he last beheld them. At his indeed all gladness and delight, end crowding round their foved lord, with smiles of welcome, his attendanta could scarcely be made to comprehend that he was again about to quit St. Germain. De Blenau's commands, however, immediately to prepare for a long journey, recalled them to their duty ; and eager to accompany him wherever he went, their arrangements were soon completed, and the major-domo announced that all was ready.

Not so the count himself, who, notwithstanding the king's command, could not resolve to quit St. Germain's without visiting the palace. Sending forward, therefore, his train to the entrance of the forest, he proceeded on foot to the gate of the park, and crossing the terrace, entered the chalteau by the small door in the western quadrangle.

Perhaps De Blenau was not without a hope that. Pauline might have returned thither from Paris ; and at first, meeting none of the royal servants, he walked from empty chamber to chamber, with a degree of undefined expectation that in each he should find the object of his wishes : but of course his search was in vain, and descending to the lower part of the building, he proceeded to the porter's chamber, who, having received no news to the contrary, informed him that the whole court was still at Chantilly.

I know not why it is, but somehow the heart, by long association with part cular objects, forms as it were a (rendship even with things inaninate, when they have been the silent witnesses of our hopes or our happiness; they form a link between us and past enjoyment, a sort of landmark for memory to guide us back to happy recollections; and to quit them, like every other sort of parting, has no small degree of pain. We are apt, too, to calculate all that may happen before we see them again, and the knowledge of the innumerable multitude of human misenes, from among which fortune may choose, gives generally to such anticipations a gloomy hue. Looking back upon the towers of St.

RICHELIEU,

Germain, De Blenau felt as if he were parting from Pauline, and parting from her for a long and indetinite time; and his heart sickened in spite of all the gay dreams to which his liberation had at first given birth.

Who is there that even when futurity is decked in the brightest colors which probably can lend to hope-when youth, and health, and ardent imagination combine to guaranty all the promises of lifewho is there, that even then does not feel the painful influence of parting from any thing that is loved ? Who is there in the world, the summer of whose bosom is so eternal, that at such moments, dark imaginings will not cloud the warmest sunshine of their heart, and cast a gloomy uncertain shadow on the most glowing scenes expectation can display ? Just so De Blenau. Fancy presented to his mind a thousand forebodings of evil, as with many a lingering look he turned again and again towards the palace ; and even when at length he was joined by his train, who waited at the entrance of the forest, he was still absorbed in gloomy meditations. However, he felt it was in vain, and springing on his horse, he turned his face resolutely on his onward way.

Skirting along the wood, he soon reached Versuilles, and thence proceeding with little saternission, he arrived in time to pass the night at Etampes, from which place he set out early the next morning for Orleans. Continuing to trace along the course of the Loire with quick stages, he soon arrived at Nevers, where he crossed the river, and shortly after entered the Bourbannois.

RICHELIEU.

CHAPTER VIII.

Which shows the

ige, " L habit ne fav

I KNOW I inconsidera the Count d despatch th....

nartial, and very itive chapters to more people to in the play, and ould not help it;

less time to those two last chapte's would go together, and they were too long to be clapped up into one pat, as I have seen Sarah the dairymaid do with the stray lumps of butter that float about in the buttermilk. after the rest of the churn's produce has been otherwise disposed of. So I am very sorry, and so forth. And now, if you please, my dear reader, we will go on to some one else. What would you think of the Norman? Very well! For my part I look upon him as the true hero of the story ; for, according to the best accounts, he ate more, drank more, lied more, and fought more than any one else, and was a great rogue into the bargain ; all which, in the opinion of Homer, is requisite to the character of a hero. See the Odyssey pussim.

At Troyes, the Norman's perquisitions were very successful. No Bow-street officer could have detected all the proceedings of Fontrailles with more acuteness. Step by step he traced him, from his first arrival at Troyes till the day he set out for Mesnil St. Loup: and learning the road he had taken, he determined upon following the same track, for he shrewdly concluded, that whatever business of import the conspirator had been engaged in, had been transacted in the two days and one night, which, according to the story of the gorcon d ma-berge at the Hotel du Grand Soleil, he had been absent from the good city of Troyes,

Now, our friend Monsieur Marieville had learned another piece of news, which made him the more willing to bend his steps in the circetion pointed out as that which Fontrailles had taken. This was no other than that a corsiderable band of robbers had lately come down into that part of the country to collect their reats; and that their principal haunt was supposed to be the thick woods which lay on the borders of the high road to Troyes, in the meighborhood of Mesnil.

True it is, the Norman had abandoned his free companions of the forest, and received the wages of Monsieur de Chavigni ; but still he kept up a sort of desultory correspondence with his former associates, and had not lost sight of them till cortain reports got about, that the lieutenant criminel was going to visit the forest of Lave, which induced them to leave the vicinity of St. Germain, for fear that there should not be room enough in the forest for them and the lieutenant too. It was natural enough that Marteville should wish to make a morning call upon his old friends : besides-I'll tell you a story. There was once upon a time a man who had a cat, of which he was so fond, that, understanding one Mr. Pigmalion had got an ivory statue changed into a wife by just asking it, he resolved to see what he could do for his cat in the same way. But I dare say you know the story just as well as I do-how the cat was changed into a woman, and how she jumped out of bed after a mouse, and so forth ; showing plainly, that " what is bred in the bone will never go out of the flesh ;" that" nature is better than a schoolmaster :" and that "you can never make a silk purse out of a now's ear ?" as Sancho would say. But, however, the Norman had a strange hankering after his g old trade, and was very well inclined to pase ? or two in the free forest, and do Chamgnis into the bargain. There was a little emberras deed in the case, respecting Louise, for whom; in these first days of possession, he did feel a certain degree of attachment; and did not choose to leave her behind, though he did not like to take her with him, considering the society he was going to meet. "Pshaw!" said he at length, speaking to himself, "I fil leave her at Mesnik."

RICHELIEG

This resolution he began to put in execution, by placing Louise upon one horse and himself upon the other, together with their several valises ; and thus, in the same state and order in which they had arrived at Troyes, so they quitted it for Mesnil St. Loup. All the information that Marteville possessed to guide him in his farther inquiries, amounted to no more than this (which he learned from the aforesaid garcon d'auberge); namely, that the little gentleman in gray had taken the road apparently to Mesnil; that he had been absent, as before said, two days and one night; and that his horse, when it came home, appeared to have been furnished with a new shoe en roude. This, however, was quite sufficient as a clew, and the Norman did not fail to turn it to its full account.

Passing through the little villages of Mehun and Langley, the Norman eyed every blacksmith's forge as he went; but the one was next to the post-house, and the other was opposite to the inn; and the Norman went on, saying within himself, "A man who was seeking concealment, would rather proceed with his beast unshod than stop there." So, resuming his conversation with Louise, they jogged on, babbling, not of green fields, but of loye and war; both of which subjects were moch within the knowledge of the Sienr Marteville, his battle being somewhat more numerous than his wives, and having that pleaty of both in his day.

At all events, Louise was very well satisfied with the husbaud that Heaven had sent her, and looked upon him as a very fine gentleman, and a gread warrior; and though, now and then, she would play the coquette a little, and put forth all the little minuderie which a Languedoe soubrette could assume, in order to prevent the Norman from having too great a superiority, yet Monsieur Marteville was better satisfied with her than with any of his former wives; and as she rode beside him, he admired her horsemanship, and looked at her from top to toe in much the same manner that he would have examined the points of a fine Norman charger. No matter how Louise was mounted : suffice it to say, that it was not on a side-saddle, such things being but little known at the time I speak of.

RICHELIEU,

While they were thus shortening the road with sweet discourse, at the door of a hitle hovel by the side of the highway, half-hidden from sight by a clumsy mud wall against which he leaned, half exposed by the lolloping position he assumed, appeared the large, dirty, unmeaning face and begrimmed person of a Champenois blacksmith, with one hand grubbing among the roots of his grizzled hair, and the other hanging listlessly by his side, loaded with the ponderons hammer appropriated to his trade. "Cest ici," through the Norman ; Quatre engl dix neuf moutons et un Champenois fond cent-minetymine sheep and a Champenois make a hundred ; so we'll see what my fool will tell me. Holla ! Monsieur."

" Plait-il?" cried the Champenois, advancing from his hut.

"Pray has Monsieur Pont Orson passed here today ?" demanded the Norman.

"Monsieur Pont Orson! Monsieur Pont Orson!" cried the Champenois. trying to assume an air of thought, and rummaging in his empty head for a name that never was in it: "Pardie, I do not know."

"I mean," said the Norman, "the same little gentleman in gray, who stopped here ten days a gone, to have a bay horse shod, as he was commuback from-what's the name of the place ?"

BICHKLINU.

"No " cried the Champenois ; "he was going, he was not coming, when he had his horse shod."

"But I say he was coming," replied the Norman. "How the devil do you know he was going ?"

" Mais Dane !" exclaimed the other: " How do I know he was going ? Why, did not he ask me how far it was to Mesnil ? and if he had not been going, why should he wish to know ?"

"It was not he, then," said the Norman.

"Mais dame ! ouni!" cried the Champenois. "He was dressed all in gray, and had a bay horse, on whose hoof I put as nice a piece of iron as ever came off an anvi; and he asked me how far it was to Memil, and whereabouts was the old Castle of St. Loup. Manaeur Pant Orson? Monsieur Pont Orson? Dieu qui aurait déviné que c'étoit Monsieur Pont Orson?"

" Mais je vous dis que ce n'étoit pas lui." cried the Norman, putting spors to his horse, "Allons, cherie. Adieu, Monrieur Champenois, adieu! Ha! ha iha!" cried be, when at a little distance. "Goncahe ! he has told me all that I wanted to know. Then he did go to Mesnil—the old Château of St. Loup ! What could he want there ? I've heard of this old château."

"But who is Monsieur Pont Orson ?" demanded Louise, interrupting the broken cogitations of her husband.

"Nay, I know not, ma chére," replied her husband. "The man in the moon, with a corkscrew to tap yon fool's brains, and draw out all I wanted to know about the person whom I told you I was seeking for Monsieur de Chavigni. It was a mere name. But there, I see a steeple on yon hill in the wood. Courage! we shall soon reach it. It is not above a lengue. That must be Mesnil."

The Norman's league, however, proved at least two, and Lonise, though a good horsewoman, was complaining most bitterly of fatigue, when they arrived in the little street of Mesnil St. Loup, and, riding up to the dwelling of our old friend Gaulties the innkeeper, alighted under the withcred garland that hung over the door.

RICHELLEU.

"Holla ! Aubergiste ! Garcon !" cried the Norman, "holla !"

But no one came ; and on repeating the summons, the sweet voice of the dame of the house was all that could be heard, screaming forth a variety of tender epithets, applicable to the garcon dicarie, and intended to stimulate him to come forth and take charge of the strangers' horses. "Don't you know, Lambin," cried she, "that that hog your master is lying up stairs dying for no one knows what 1 And am I to go out, Maraud, and take people's horses with my hands all over grease, while you stand I—s—ng yourself there ? Cochan ? If you do not go, PII throw this pot-lid at you?" And immediately a tremendous ratile on the boards at the farther side of the stable, announced that she had been as good as her word.

This seemed the only effectual method of arousing the occult sensibilities of the garcan d'écurie, who listened unconcerned to her gentler solicitations, but, yielding to the more potent application of the pot-lid, came forth and took the bridle of the horses, while our Norman lifted his lady to the ground.

The sight of such goodly limbs as those possessed by Monsieur Marteville, but more especially the blue velvet pourpoint to which we have formerly alluded, and which he wore on the present occasion, did not fail to produce the most favourable impression on the mind of the landlady; and, bustling about with the activity of a grasshopper, she propared to serve the athletic cavalier and his pratty lady to the best cheer of the aubrege.

"Would madame choose some stewed escargots pour se restaurer? Would monsieur take un caup de rin before dinner to wash the dust out of him mouth? Would monsieur take a gouter?" The herself? Would monsieur take a gouter?" The and a thousand other civil proffers the host showered upon the Norman and Louise, some of which were accepted, some declined; but the principal thing on which the Norman secmed to set his heart was the speedy preparation of dinner, which he ordered with the true galloping profusion of a beggar on horseback, demanding the best of every thing. While this was in progress, he forgot not the principal object of his journey, but began with some circumlocotion to draw the hostess towards the subject of Fontrailles' visit to Mesnil.

BICHELIEU.

At the very mention, however, of a little man in gray, the good landlady burst forth in such a torrent of invective that she went wall nigh to exhaust her copious vocabulary of epithets and expletives; while the Norman, taken by surprise, stood gazing and shrugging his shoulders, wondering at her facility of utterance, and the vast rapidity with which she concatenated her hard names. The little man in gray, who had been there precisely ten days before, was, according to ber opinion, a liar, and a rogue, and a cheat; a conjuror, a Huguenot, and a vagabond ; a man without honour, principle, or faith; a maraud, a matin, a miserable; together with a great many other titles the enumeration of which she summed up with " et sil n'est pas le Diable, l'emporte m

"C'est vrai," cried the Norman every time she paused to take breath : C'est vrai. But how came you to find out he was so wicked !"

The lady's reply was not of the most direct kind; but from it the Norman gathered, with his usual neutrons; that after our friend Gaultier had pointed out to Fontrailes the read to the old Castle of St. Loup, he returned home, his mind oppressed with the consciousness of being the confidant of a sorcerer. He laboured under the load of this terrific secret for some days; and then, his constitution not being able to support his mental straggles, he sickened and took to his bed, sware he still lay in a deplorable state, talking in his sweep of the conjurer in gray, and of Pere Le Rouge, and the devil himself, and sundry other respectable people of the same class. But when awake, it must be remarked, the aubergiste tever opened his lips upon the subject, notwithstanding all the solicitations which his better half, being tempted by the curiesity of her sex, did not fail to make. From all this the good dame concluded that the little man in gray had bewitched her husband and driven him mad, cassing him to lie up there upon his bed like a hog, neglecting his business and leaving her worse than a widow.

All this was corn, wine, and oil, to the mind of the Norman, who, wisely reserving his opinion on the subject, retired to consult with Louise, having a great esteem for woman's wit in such cases. After some discussion, a plan was manufactured between them, which, though somewhat bold in conception, was happily brought to issue in the following manner.

During the dinner, at which the bourgeoise waited herself, she was not a little surprised to hear Louise more than once call Marteville by the reverend appellation of mon père; and if this astonished, how much was her wonder increased when afterward, during a concerted absence of the Norman, the fair lady informed her, under a promise of profound secrecy, that the goodly cavalier, whose blue velvet doublet she had so much admired, was neither more nor less than the celebrated Père Alexis, directeur of the Jesuits of Alençon, who was travelling in disguise in order to place her (one of his peritents) in a monestery at Rome.

True, Louise either forgot or did not know that they were not precisely in the most direct road to Rome, but she was very safe in the person she spoke to, who had even less knowledge of whore Rome stood than herself. Now the story of Louise was a very probable one in every other respect considering the manners of the day; for tes bon perso Jesuides very often travelled about in desp for purposes best known to themselves, and few of the bois pères, whether Jesuits or not, wire averse to a fair penitent. Be that as it may, the simple bourgeoise never doubted it for a moment, and casting herself at the feet of Louise, she entreated her, with tears in her eyes, to intercede with the reversend directeur to confess and absolve her sinful husband, who lay up-stairs like a hog, doing mothing.

Just at this moment the Norman re-entered the room; and though his precise object, in the little drama they had got up, was neither more nor less than to confess the unhappy anhergiste, yet, as a matter of form, be made some difficulty to medding with the penitent of another; but after faintly advising that the cost of the village should be sent for, he agreed, as the case was urgent, to undertake the office of confessor himself, though he mildly reproched Louise, in presence of the hostess, for having betrayed his real character, and bade her be more careful in future.

As soon as he had signified his consent, the bourgroise ran to tell her husband that the very reverend Pere Altris, directeur of the Jesuits of Alençun, had kindly consented to hear his confession and absolve him of his sins; and in the meanwhile the Norman gave directions to Louise, whose adroituess had often served him in discovering the secrets of the palace, while she had remained with Madame de Beaumont, to gain, in the present instance, all the information she could from the wife, while he went to interrogate the husband,

This being settled, as a blue velvet pourpoint was not exactly the garb to play a confessor in. Louise ran in all host to strip the strologer's robe we have already mentioned of all its profame symbols, and the Norman, casting its shadowy folds over his lasty limbs, and drawing the hood over his head, appeared to the eye as goodly a friar as ever crackod a bottle. No great regard to costome was nocessary, for the landlady took it all for granted ; and when she beheld the Norman issue torth from the room in which the valise had been placed, clothed in his long dark robes, she cast herself at his feet in a transport of reverence and piety.

Monsicur Marteville, otherwise the Pere Alexis, did not fail to give her his blessing with great gravity, and with a solemn demeanor and slow step followed to the chamber of the sick man.

Poor Gaultier was no longer the gay rosy-cheeked inkeeper which he had appeared to Fontrailles, but stretched upon his bed, he lay pale and wan, muttering over to himself shreds and tatters of prayers, and thinking of the little man in gray, Pere Le Rouge, and the devil. As soon as he beheld the pretended Pére Alexis into his chamber, he essayed to rise in his bed ; but the Norman motioned him to be still, and sitting down by him, exhorted him to make a full confession of his sins, and then, to give greater authenticity to his character, he knelt down and composed an extempore prayer, in language equally of his own manufacture, but which the poor aubergiste believed devoutly to be Latin, hearing every now and then the words sanctissimus, in secula seculorum, and benedictus, with which the Norman did not fail to season it richly, being the only stray Latin he was possessed of.

" Homounnibus quintessentialiter expositu dam Jum ; benedictas sint föolatii et sanctissinus fuorbi. Hi sty Aubergisti rorum corum no bis excipa capones poulardici generi, fur gratavernat pectus, legbonibus in secula seculorum sanctissimus benedictas." said the Norman.

"Amon !" cried the innkceptr from the bottom of his heart, with such fervency that the Pere Alexis could scarcely maintain his gravity.

The Normin now proceeded to business, and putting down his car to a level with the tips of Gaultier, he once more desired him to make a clean breast.

"Oh, mon Pere," cried Gaultier; " Je was provere preheur, un missendale "

The good father exhorted him to take courage, and to come to a detail of his crimes.

" Oh, mon Pére, cried he, "I have sold cats for rabbits, and more especially for harcs. I have moistened an old hareskin with warm water and - bland bloodied it with 'a make my cats and my badgers. is for what they really were not. snakes for cels. and dressed vipers e sold bad wine nay; and, Oh, of Boismarly for tr. mon Pére, je * "Well, we Norman somesolution for all what impatic that. All inL. But what more have you done ?'

"Oh, mon Père," je suis un pauvre pécheur, proceeded Gaultier in a low voice; "I have lehargod my customers twice as much as I aught to charge. I have vowed that fish was dear when it was cheap; and I have-"

" Nom de Dieu !" cried the Norman, getting out of temper with the recapitulation of Gaultier's peccadilloes. "Nom de Dieu ! that is to say, in the name of God, I absolve you from all such sins as are common to innkeepers masters of taverns, cooks, anbergistes and the like-sins of profession as they may be called-only appointing you to kneel before the altar of your parish church for two complete hours, repeating the Pater and the Ave during the whole time, by way of penance," thought he, " for making me hear all this nonsense. -But, come," he continued, "bring up the heavy artillery-that is, let me hear your more uncommon sins. You have some worse things upon your conscience than any you have told, or I am mistaken."

"Oh, mon Pére ! Oh, mon hon Pére !" groaned Gaultier, "Je mis un pourre picheur, un miséroble."

"Now it comes," thought the Norman ;" Allow

BICHELLEU.

allons, mon fils, ayez courage ! l'eglise est pleine de misèricorde?

"There was an old owl in the barn," said Gaultier, " and woodcocks being scarce-"

" Ventre St. Gris! this will never come to an end ;" cried Marteville to himself. ' Mais mon fils," he said aloud, " I have told you, all that is pardoned. Speak, can you charge yourself with murder, treason, conspiracy, sorcery,"-Gaultier groaned-"astrology,"-Gaultier groaned still more deeply-" or of having concealed any such crimes. when committed by others ?" Gaultier groaned a third time. The Norman had now brought him to the point; and after much moaning, hesitation, and agony of mind, he acknowledged that he had been privy to a meeting of sorcerers. Nav, that he had even conducted a notorious astrologer, a little man in gray, on the road to meet the defunct Père Le Rouge and his companion the devil, at the old Chateau of St. Loup; and that it was his remorse of conscience for this crime, together with his terror at revealing it, after the menaces of the sorcerer, that had thrown him into the lamentable state in which he then lay.

By degrees, the Norman drew from him every particular, and treasuring them up in his memory, he hastened to give the suffering innkcepus absolution : which though not performed in the most orthodox manner, quite shtisticd Gaultier; who concluded, that any little difference of form from that to which he had been used, proceeded from the Norman being a Jesuit and a directeur ; and he afterward was heard to declare, that the Pere Alexis was the most picus and saintly of men, and that one absolution from him was worth a hundred from any one else; although the care of the village, when he heard the method in which it had been administered, pronounced it to be heterodox and hereixcanand in short a damnable error.

And here be it remarked, that a neighboring can having taken up the quartel of Pire Alexis, a pronounced his form to be the right one, a violent controversy ensued, which raged in Champagne for more than fifty years, producing nine hundred pamphlets, three thousand letters, twenty public discussions, and four papal bulls, till at length it was agreed on all hands to write to the Jesuits of Alencon, and demand their authority for such a deviation from established ralls; when it was discovered that they administered absolution like every one else; and that they never had such a person as Père Alexis belonging to their very respectable and learned body.

RIOHELIEU.

But to return to the Norman. As soon as he concluded all the ceremonies he thought right to perform, for the further consolation of Gaultier, he said to him, "Fear not, my son, the memces of the sorcerer; for I forbid all evil beings, even were it the devil bimself, to lay so much as the tip of a finger upon you; and moreover, I will go this very night to the old chitesh of St Loup, and will erorcise Pere Le Rouge and drive his spirit forth from the place, and, morbleau? if he dare appear to me I middle of the village, and all the little children shall drum him out of the regiment—I mean out of the tow."

With this hold resolution, Monsieur Marteville descended to the ground floor, and communicated his design to Louise and the bourgeoise, who were sitting with their noises together over a flagon of vin chaud. "Domnes noi un coup de vin said he, "et firai."

But Louise, who did not choose to trust her new husband ont of her sight, having discovered by a kind of instinct, that in his case "absence was worre than death." declared she would go with him, and see him nike Pere Le Rouge by the beard. The Norman remonstrated, but Louise persived with a sort of sweet pertinacity which was quite irresulble, and, though somewhat out of humor with her obstinacy, he was obliged to constant.

However, he growled audibly, while she assisted to disembarrass him of his long black r be; and probably, had it not been for his assumed character. would have accompanied his opposition with more than one of those elegant expletives with which he was wont to season his discourse. Louise, notwithstanding all this, still maintained her point, and the horses being brought forth, the bags were placed on their backs, and the Norman and his spouse set forth for the old château of St. Loup, taking care to repeat their injunction to the landlady not to discover their real characters to any one, as the business of the pére directeur required the utmost seerecy.

The landlady promised devoutly to comply, and having seen her guests depart, entered the public room, where several of the peasantry had by this time assembled, and told every one in a whisper that the tall gentleman they had seen get on horseback was the Père Alexis, directeur of the Jesuits of Alençon, and that the lady was Mademoiselle Louise de Crackmacknole, sa penitente. Immediately, they all ran in different directions, some to the door, some to the window, to see so wonderful a pair as the Père Alexis and his penitente. The bustle, rushing, and chattering which succeeded, and which the landlady could no way abate, called the attention of the Sieur Marteville, who, not particularly in a good humor at being contradicted by Louise, was so much excited into anger by the gaping of the multitude, that he had well nigh drawn the portentous Toledo, which hung by his side, and returned to satisfy their curiosity by presenting his person rather nearer than they might have deemed agreeable. He bridled in his wrath, however, or rather, to change the figure, kept it in store for some future occasion; and consoling himself with a few internal curses, in which Louise had he share, he rode on and soon arrived at that part the wood which we have already said was nam the Sorcerer's Grove.

VOL. IL.

Of the unheard of adventures which there befel him, the giants that he slew, and the monsters that he overcame, we shall treat in a future chapter, turning our attention at present to other important subjects which call loudly for detail.

CHAPTER IX.

Being a chapter of explanatio casion to peruse if he unde story without it :

"GREAT news! Cinq trailes. "Great news! ardinal is sick to the death, and goes without are of time to Tarascon ; he trembles upon the brink of the grave."

Cinq Mars was stretched upon three chairs, the farthest of which he kept balanced on its edge by the weight of his feet, idly rocking it backwards and forwards, while his mind was deeply buried in one of the weak romances of the day, the reading which was a favorite amusement with the master of the horse, at those periods when the energies of his mind seemed to sleep. "Too good news to be true, Fontrailles," he reflied, hardly looking up; "take my word for it, the devil never dies."

"That may be," answered Fontrailles, " bat nevertheless, the cardinal, as Isaid, is dying, and goes instantly to Tarascon to try another climate."

"Why, where hast thou heard all this ? and when didst thou come from Spain ?" demanded Cinq Mars, rousing himself. Thou hast made good speed."

"Had I not good reason !" asked the other. "But they tell me that I must question you for news; for that it is something in regard to your friend, the young Count de Blenau, which has deeply struck the cardinal."

Well then, I will give the story, in true heroic style," answered Cinq Mars, tossing the book from him. "'Thou dost remember, O my friend !" he continued, imitating the language of the romance he had just been reading, " how stormy was the night, when last I parted from thee, at the old Chateau of Mesnil St. Loup ; and if the thunder-clouds passed away, and left the sky clear and moonlighted, it was but to be succeeded by a still more violent tempest. For, long after thou wert snugly housed at Troyes, De Thou and myself were galloping on through the storm of the night. The rain fell, the lightning glanced, the thunder rolled over head, and the way seemed doubly long, and the forest doubly dreary, when by a sudden blaze of the red fire of heaven, I descried some one, mounted on a white horse, come rapidly towards us."

"Come, come, Ciaq Mars!" exclaimed Fontrailles, "for grace, leave the land of romance--remember I have a long story to tell, and not much time to tell it in. Truce with imagination therefore, for we have more serious work before us."

"It's truth-it's truth, thou unbelieving Jew," cried Cinq Mars. " No romance, I can assure you, Well, soon as this white horseman saw two others wending their way towards him, he suddenly reined in his beast, and turning round, galloped off as hard as he could go. Now, if curiosity be a failing, it is one I possess in an eminent degree ; so, clapping sours to my horse, after him 1 went, fall faster than he ran away. As for De Thou, he calls out after me, loud enough to drown the thunder, cryiny, 'Cing Mars, where are you going ?-In God's name stop-We know the place is full of banditti-If these are robbers, they may murder you,' and so on ; but finding that I did not much heed, he also was smitten with a galloping fit, and so we followed each other, like a procession, though with no " cession pace ; the white horseman first-I ne and De Thou last-with about a hundred yards tween each of us-going at full speed, to the peril of our necks, and no small danger of our heads from the boughs. I was best mounted however, on my stout black horse Sloeberry-you know Sloeberry ;-and so distancing De Thou all to nothing. I began to come closer to my white horseman, who, finding that he could not get off, gradually pulled in, and let me come up with him. 'Well, sir,' said he directly, with all possible coolness-' you have ridden hard to-night.' 'In truth, I have, my man,' answered I, ' and so have you, and I should much like to know why you did so.' 'For the same reason that you did, I suppose,' replied the boy, for such it was who spoke .- ' And what reason is that?' I asked .- ' Because we both liked it, I suppose,' replied he .- 'That may be,' answered I ; 'but we all have a reason for our likings.'-' True, sir,' said the boy, 'and I dare say yours was a good one; pray, believe that mine was so also '-All the time he spoke, he kept looking round at me, till at last he got a good sight of my face. 'Are not you Monsieur de Cinq Mars ?' cried he at length. 'And if I am, what follows then ?'-' Why, it follows that you are the person 1 want,' said the boy .-.' And what want you with me ?'- Who is that ?' demanded he, pointing to De Thou, who now came up. I soon satisfied him on that score, and he went on. 'My name is Henry de la Mothe, and I am page to your good friend, the Count de Blenau, whom I have seen arrested and carried to the Bestille."

BICHELIEU.

"Now, you know, Fontrailles, how 'dear I hold Da Blenae; so you may goess how pleasantly this rang upon my car. My first question to the page was, whether my friend had sent him to me. 'No, no, seignour,' answered the boy; 'but as I knew you loved my mmter, and the king loved you, I thought it best to let you know, in case you might wish to serve him.—He was taken as he was about to go with the queen to Chantily, and they would not let me or any other go with him, to serve him in prison. So I cast about in my mind, how Locuid serve him out of it, and consequently came off te seek you.'--' But how did you know where to find me ?' demanded I, not a little fearing that our movements were watched ; but the boy relieved me from that by answering, 'Why, sir, there was a messenger came over from Chantilly, to desire the queen's presence : and among all the questions I asked him, there was one which made him tell me that you had gone to Troyes, upon some business of inheritance, and as I heard that the path through this wood would save me a leagne, I took it, hoping to reach the town to-night.'

RICHELIEV.

"Well, all the page's news vexed me not a little, and I thought of a thousand things to relieve De Blenau ere I could fix on any. But it happened, as it often does in this world, that chance directed me when reasoning failed. Having made the best of my way, I arrived with De Thou and the boy at Chantilly, at the hour of nine the next night, and passing towards my own apartments in the palace, I saw the king's cabinet open, and on inquiry, found that he had not yet retired to rest. My resolution was instanly taken ; and without waiting even to dust my boots, I went just as I was, to pay my duty to his majesty. My short absence had done me no harm with Louis, who received me with more grace than ever; so while the newness was on, I dashed at the subject next my heart at once. Like a wellbred falcon, I soared my full pitch, hovered an instant in my pride of place, and then stooped at once with irresistible force. In short, Foutrailles, for the first time I believe in my life, I boasted. told Louis how I loved him; I counted over the services I had done him. His noble heart-you may smile, sir, but he has a noble heart-was touched; I saw it, and gave him a moment to think over all old passages of affection between us, and to combine them with the feelings of the m ment, and then I told him that my friend my bosom friend-was suffering from the tyrs ny of the cardinal, and demanded his favor for Blanau, 'What can I do, Cing Mars?' damas

he, 'you know I must follow the advice of my ministers and counsellors.'

" It was an opportunity not to be lost," exclaimed Fontrailles, eagerly ; " I hope you seized it."-" 1 did," replied Cing Mars. "I plied him hard on every point that could shake the influence of Richelicu. I showed L. .neful bondage he suffered. I told him, allowed the sovereign power, placed by God hands, to be abused by another, he was as guilty as if he misused it himself; and then I said-'I plead alive ; for the innocent, sir. Hear De Blenau yours and if you find him guilty, bring him to the b t once. But if he have done nothing worthy ath I will trust that your majesty's justice w antly set him free.' Well, the king not only promised that he would go to Paris and examine De Blenau himself, but he added, 'And I will be firm, Cino Mars; I know the power is in my own bands | 1 will exert it to save your fri---iminal."

" This w:

more; but L

; I could desire no expectation. Something had al., managainst the cardinal-I think it was the banishment of Clara de Hauteford. However, he went to the Bastille with Richelieu, Chavigni, and others of the council. Of course I was not admitted; but I heard all that passed from one who was present. De Blenau bore him nobly and bravely, and downright refused to answer any questions about the queen, without her majesty's own commands. Well; Richelieu according to custom, was for giving him the torture instantly. But the king had many good reasons for not suffering that to be done. Besides wishing to pleasure me. and being naturally averse to cruelty, he had a lingering inclination to cross Richelieu ; and De Blenau's firmness set him a good example : so the cardinal was overruled; and the queen's commands to De Blenau to confess all being easily procured, he owned that he had forwarded lattarg from her majesty to her brother the King of Spatia.

AL

Now, you see, Richelieu was angry, and irritated at being thwarted; and he did the most foolish thing that man ever did; for though he saw that Louis was roused, and just in the humour to cross him, he got up, and not considering the king's presence, at once pronounced a sentence of exile against De Blenau, as if the sovereign power had been entirely his own, without consulting Louis, or asking his approbation at all. Though, God knows, the king cares little about using his power, of course he does not like to be treated as a mere cipher before his own council; and accordingly he revoked the cardinal's sentence without hesitation, sending De Blengu, merely for form's sake, into Bourbon, and then rising, he broke up the council, treating Richelieu with as scanty consideration as he had shown himself. By Heaven! Fontrailles, when I heard it, I could have played the fool for joy. Richelieu was deeply touched, you may suppose ; and what with his former ill-health and this new blow, he has never been himself since ; but I knew not that he was so far gone as you describe."

"It is so reported in Paris," replied Fontrailles, "and he has become so humble that no one would know him. But mark me, Cinq Mars. The cardinal is now upon the brink of a precipice, and we must urge him quickly down; for if he once again gain the ascendency. we are not only lost foreyer, but his power will be far greater than it was before."

"He will never rise more in this world," answered Cinq Mars. "His day, I trust, is gone by : his health is broken; and the king, who always hated him, now begins to fear him no longer. I will do my best to strengthen Louis's resolution, and get him into a way of thinking for himseld. And now, Pontrailles, for the news from Sysin." "Why, my story might be made longer in yours, if I were to go through all that happened me on the road. It was a long and barron ney, and I believe I should have been almost starved before I reached Madrid, if I had not halffilled my bags with biscuits. However, I arrived at length, and not without some difficulty found a place to lodge, for these cold Spaniards are as fearial of admitting a stranger to their house, as if he were a man-figer. My next step was to send for a tailor, and to hire me a lacquais or two, one of whom I sent instantly to Madame de Chevreuse, praying an audience of her, which was granted immediately."

"Why thou wert not mad enough to make a confidante of Madame de Cheyreuse " exclaimed Cinq Mars; " why, it is carrying water in a sieve. A thousand to one she makes her peace with Richelieu, by telling him the whole story."

"Foar not, Cinq Mars," answered Fontrailles. "Have you yet to learn that a woman's first possion is revenge 7. To such extent is the hatred of Madame de Chevreuse against the Cardinal, that i believe, were she asked to sacrifice one of her beautiful hands, she would do it, if it would but conduce to his ruin."

Cinq Mars shook his head, still doubting the propriety of what had been done; but Fontrailles proceeded.

" However, I told her nothing ; she knew it all be fore I set loot in Spain. You must know, King Philip is a monarch no way insensible to female charms, and the duchess is too lovely to pass ur noticed any-The consequences are natural; a lady of where. her rank having taken refuge in his dominions, of course the king must pay her every attention. Heig always with her-has a friendship, a penchant, an affection for her-call it what you will, but it is that sort of feeling which makes a man tell a woman every thing ; and thus very naturally our whole correspondence has gone direct to Madame de Chevreuse. My object in first asking to see her, was only to gain an immediate audience of the king, which she can always command ; but when I found she knew the whole business, of course I made her believe that I came for the express purpose of consulting her upon it. Her vanity was flattered. She became more than ever convinced that she was a person of infinite consequence and acknowledged discernment; entered heart and hand into all our schemes ; stuck out her pretty little foot, and made me buckle her shoe ; brought me speedily to the king's presence, and made him consent to all I wished; got the treaty signed and sealed, and sent me back to France with my object accomplished, remaining, herself fully convinced that she is at the head of the most formidable conspiracy that ever was formed, and that future ages will celebrate her talents for diplomacy and intrigue."

Cinque Mars, though not fully satisfied at the admission of so light a being as Madame de Chevrouse into secrets of such importance, could not help smiling at the account his companion gave; and as it was in vain to regret what was done, he turned to the present, asking what was to be done next. "[No time is now to be lost," said he. "For the whole danger is now incurred and we must not allow it to be fruitess."

"Cortainly not," answered Fontrailles. "You must ply the king hard to procure his consent as far as possible. In the next place a counterpart of the treaty must be signed by all the confederates, and sent into Spain, for which I have pledged my word ; and another, similarly signed, must be sent to the Duke of Bouillon in Italy. But who will carry is to the duke 7 that is the question. I cannot absent myself again."

"I will provide a messenger," said Cinq Mars. "There is an Italian attached to my service named Ville Grands, a sort of half-bred gentleman, who, lacking gold himself, hangs upon any who will feed him. They hugh at him here for his long moust chios, and his long rapier; but if he tell truth, be rapier has done good service; so, as this will be undertaking of danger, he shall have it, as he

RICHELLEU.

he seeks but to distinguish himself in my service, and, being an Italian, he knows the country to which he is going."

"If you can trust him, be it so," replied Fontrailles: "At present let us look to other considerations. We must seek to strengthen our party by ail means; for though circumstances seem to combine to favor us, yet it is necessary to guard against any change. Do you think that the queen could be brought to join us ?"

"Certainly not!" replied the master of the horse; "and if she would, to us it would be far more dangerous than advantageous. She has no power over the mind of the king—she has no separate authority; and besides, though Richelieu's avowed enemy, she is so cautious of giving offence to Louis, that she would consent to nothing that was not openly warranted by him."

"But suppose we are obliged to have recourse to arms," said Fontrailles, "would it not be every thing in our favor to have in our hands the queen and the heir apparent to the throne." "True," answered Cinq Mars; "but if we are

"True," answered Cinq Mars; "but if we are driven to such extremity, she will be obliged to declare for some party, and that of necessity must be ours; for she will never side with Richelieu. We can also have her well surrounded by her friends, and seize upon the Dauphin should the case require it."

"What say you, then, to trying the Count de Blenau? He is your friend. He is brave, expert in war, and just such a man as leads the blind multitude. But more, he is wealthy and powerful, and has much credit in Languedoc."

"I do not know," said Cinq Mars, thoughtfully, "I do not know." De Blenau would never betray us, even if he refused to aid our scheme. But I much think his scruples would go further than even De Thou's. I have often remarked, he has that sort of nicety in his ideas which will not suffer him to enter into any thing which may, by even a remote chance, cast a shade upon his name."

LICHELIEU.

"Well, we can try him at all events," said Fontrailles. "You, Cinq Mars, can ask him whether he will join the liberators of his country."

"No, Fontrailles," answered the master of the horse in a decided tone; "no, I will not do it.--Claude de Blenau is a man by whom I should not like to be refused. Besides, I should hesitate to involve him, young and noble-hearted as he is, in a scheme which might draw down ruin on his head."

"In the name of Heaven, Cinq Mars," cried Fontrailles, with real astonishment at a degree of generosity of which he could find no trace in his own bosom," of what are you dreaming ? Are you phrensied ? Why, you have engaged life and fortune, hope and happiness, in this scheme yourself, and can you love another man better ?"

"There is every difference, Fontrailles—every difference. If I cut my own throat, I am a fool and a madman, granted; but if I cut the throat of another man, I am a murderer, which is somewhat worse. But I will be plain with you. I have embarked in this with my eyes open, and it is my own fult. Therefore, whatever happens. I will go on and do my best for our success. But mark me, Fontrailles, if all were to come over again, I would rather lay down one of my hands, and have it chopped off, than enter into any engagement of the kind."

A cloud came over the brow of Fontrailles for a moment and a gleam of rage lighted up his dark gray eye, which even, however, passed away from his features, though the rankling passion still lay at his heart, like a smouldering fire, which wants but a touch to blaze forth and destroy. But his look, as I have said, was soon cleared of all trace of anger; and he replied with that show of cheerfaluess which he well knew how to assume. " Well, Cinon Mars, I do not look upon it in so gloomy a light a you do: though perhaps, were it now to begins, might not be so ready in it either, for the observe we have run are great; but these I trust, are over, and every thing certainly looks prosperous at present. However, there is no use in thinking what either of us might do had we now our choice. We are both too far engaged to go back at this time of day; so let us think alone of insuring success, and the glory of having attempted to free our country will at least be ours, let the worst befall us."

The word glory was never without its effect on Cinq Mars. It was his passion, and was but the more violent from the restrict to which his constant attendance on the king had subjected it, seldom having been enabled to display in their proper field those high qualities which he possessed as a soldier. "So far you are right, Fontrailles," replied he; "the glory even of the attempt is great, and we have but one course to pursue, which is straightforward to our object. You, do every thing to bind the fickle goddess to our cause, and so will I; but thinking as I do, I cannot find it in my heart to involve De Blenau. Manage that as you like; only do not ask me to do it."

"Oh, that is easily done," answered Fontrailles, "without your bearing any part in it. Of course each of the confederates has a right to invite whomsoever he may think proper to join his party, and it would be highly dishonorable of any other to dissuade the person so invited from aiding the scheme on which all our lives depend. The Count de Blenau, I think you say, is now retired to Bourbon.--There also is the Duke of Orleans, and I will take care that he shall broach the subject to the count without implicating you."

Cinq Mars started from his seat, and began pacing the room with his eves bent on the ground, feeling an undefined sensation of dissatisfaction at the plans of Fontrailles, yet hardly knowing how to oppose them. "Well, well," said he at length; "it is your business, not mine; and besides, I do not in the least, think that De Blenau will listen to you for a moment. He has other things to think of-emoiselle de Beaumont is absent, and no one ws where ; and he must soon hear of it." Be that as it may," replied Fontrailles, "I will And now, Cinq Mars, let me touch upon an er point "and the wily canspirator prepared all powers to work upon the mind of his less cauus companion, and to urge him on to an attempt hich had already been the object of more than he conspiracy in that day, but which, by some uncountable means, had always failed without any pparent difficulty or obstacle. This was no other han the assassination of the Cardinal de Richelieu and those who read the memoirs of the factionbreathing Gondi, or any other of the historical records of the time, will wonder hew, without any precaution for his personal safety, Richelieu escaped the many hands which were armed for his de-Princes and nobles, warriors and politicians had thought it no crime to undertake the death of this struction. tyrant minister; but yet there was something in the mind of Cinq Mars so opposite to every thing base and treacherous, that Fontrailles feared to approach boldly the proposal he was about to make. " Let us suppose, my noble friend," said he, in that slow. and energetic manner which often lends authority to bad argument, " that all our schemes succeedthat the tyrant is stripped of the power he has so abosed-that the tiger is enveloped in our toils.-What are we to do? Are we to content opraelves with having caught him ? Are we only to hold him for a moment in our power, and then set him loose again, once more to ravage France, and to destroy ourselves? And if we agree to hold him in captivity, where shall we find chains sufficient to bind him, of a cage in which we can confine him with security, when there a thousand other tigers of his race ready to attack the hunters of their fellow "I propose nothing of the kind," answer Mars ; "once stripped of his actionity." arraigned for the crimes which he has and suffer the death he has merited. The thousands will cry out for justice, and his $v_{\rm E}$ tures will spurn the monster which they from fear."

"Then you think him worthy of death, sa trailles, in that kind of undecided manner showed that he felt he was treading on dau ground. "Worthy of death!" exclaimed Cinc "who can doubt it ?-Fontrailles, what is you mean ? You speak as if there was some your mind that you know not how to di Speak, man. What is it you would say ?"

"Who will deny that Brutus was a patriot Fontrailles; " a brave, a noble, and a gloriou And Brutus stabbed Cæsar in the Capitol! Mars, when the freedom of our country is a shall we wait tamely till we have prached monarch into compliance, or drawn a foreign to our aid, when one-single-hand could work of justice, and rid the world of a tyra has lived so much too long ?"

" Ha !" exclaimed Cinq Mars, starting ba laying his hand upon his sword; " dost tho pose me an assassin? Art thou one thyse thou canst so well gloze over murder with tale of antiquity ?—Monsieur de Fontraill continued more calmly, but still with stern i tion, "you have mistaken the person to who addressed yourself. Pardon me. We will sy more upon this subject, lest we end worse than we began."

Fontrailles was not a common hypocrite; at once that on this point persunsion would be and defence of his first proposal would but the worse impression on the mind of his ce ion; and therefore his determination was for a moment to take up the exact reverse posi that which he had just occupied, and if pos force Cing Mars into a belief that the prop only been made to try him. The first wild his companion had caused Fontrailles to d as under command, he fixed his Mars, and instead of any sign of any pointment, he threw into his counter pression of gratified admiration, "C noble friend " he exclaimed, opening embrace him as the other concluded ; man I thought you ! Pardon me if i to trv you ! but when I beard you propo the cardinal's life by our plans, I knew i that idea might lead you, and I wished to the man with whom I was so deeply en declare before Heaven, that had I found proposed to do Richeliea to death by augh gal means, I should have been deeply grie would have fled from France wheree er my might lead, leaving you to follow your plana you might. Bat I am now satisfied, and your pardon for having ever doubted you." Cinq Mars suffered the embrace which Fo les proffered, but returned it coldly. Acting acting, however near it may approach to natur notwithstanding all the hypocritic Fontrailles was a moster to exert on the

CHAPTER X.

Which evinces the necessity of saying No; and shows what it is to hunt upon a wrong scent.

Is journeying onward towards the Bourbonnois, the thoughts of De Blenau had full time to rest upon the late occurrences; and though these had been of such a fearful nature, yet so rapidly had they passed, that dangers and sorrows, prisons and trials, floated before his remembrance like a confused and uncertain dream; and it required an effort to fix all the particular circumstances in their correct position, for the purpose of investigating the motives of the principal actors in those events which had so deeply affected himself.

This, when he could turn his mind from happier contemplations, was the principal occupation of his thoughts; and more especially in reflecting upon the conduct of the king. De Blenau imagined that he could perceive a regular design in every part of the monarch's behavior, which in truth it did not possess. Under this view he was left to conclude, that he had been ordered to retire to Bourbon for the specific reason that he had there no acquaintance or influence which could be dangerous to the government ; but it is more probable that Louis not wishing to reverse the cardinal's sentence entirely. by freely pardoning De Blenau, had in the hurry of the moment mentioned any province that suggested itself. However that might be, it so happened that De Blenau was hardly known to any individual within the limits to which, by the king's command, he was bound to confine himself. Nor did he feel any additional uncomfort in the prospect of passing short space of time in comparative solitude; for his mind was not likely to be well attuned to society, while constrained to absent himself from those he loved best; and he was rather pleased than otherwise, that the time of his separation from Pauline would be passed without the annoyance of associating with people to whom he was indifferent.

De Blenau's first care, on arriving at Moulines, was to write to Pauline de Beaumont.

Fancy might easily supply his letter, which is otherwise irrecoverably gone ; but as each reader's imagination will do more justice to it, according to his own taste, than mine could do, I will leave it unwritten here, especially as I have undertaken to commemorate truth only; and I really know nothing of the matter. Suffice it that it was full of all that affection, and gratitude and hope, and delight could suggest, and gave a bright picture of a bright and happy mind. As couriers and posts in those days were as different from such things at present, as the first wooden clock was from a modern chronometer, De Blenau did not choose to trust his letter to the uncertain conveyance of the government carrier, or, as he was then called, the ordinaire ; but placing it in the hands of his trusty page Henry de la Mothe, he sent him forth upon a journey to St. Germain, with orders to deliver many a kind greeting to Pauline in person, and to bring back an answer with all speed.

The hoy set out, and De Blenau, flatterng himself with the idea that his banishment from court would not be of any long continuauce, took his residence for the time in the immediate neighborhood of Moulins, contenting himself with an old château, the proprietor of which was very willing—his fortune and his castle both being somewhat decayedto sacrifice his pride of birth, in consideration, of a handsome remuteration from the young count

Here De Blenau had dwelt some time, weating the return of his messenger, and in possession

VOL. 11.

RIOHELLEU.

that quiet solitude most consonant to his fermination of the solution of the s

Accordingly, on the following evening, as the hour drew near, he mounted his horse, and, accompanied by his usual attendants, proceeded towards St. Amand. Having ridden on for more than an hour without meeting any one above the rank of a peasant, he began to accuse himself for having been the dupe of what might prove some foolish joke. He had even reined in his horse with the purpose of returning, when he perceived a person approaching on horseback, who, notwithstanding a sort of carelessness,-even perhaps, slovenliness of manner and carriage-had about him that undefinable air, which in all ages, and in every guisedenotes a gentleman, and a distinguished one. It was not, however, till he came near, that De Blenau recognised Gaston Duke of Orleans, whom he had not seen for some time. The moment he did remember him, he gave him the centre of the road, and soluting him respectfully, was passing on, never dreaming that the summons he had received could have proceeded from him.

"Good day, Monsieur de Blenau. You are close upon the hour," said the dake, drawing up his horse, and at once allowing the coust to understand that it was with him that the appointment had been made.

"I was not aware," replied De Blenau, "that" the summons which I received last night was from so honorable a hand, or I should have had no hesitation in obeying."

"Why, that is right," said the duke. "The truth is, I wished much to see you, Monsieur le Comte, upon a business wherein you may not only be of much service to yourself and me, but also to your country. We will ride on, if you please; and as we go, I will explain myself farther."

De Blenau turned his horse, and rode with the duke; but the warning which Chavigni had given him, came strongly into his mind; and Gaston of Orleans was too famous for the unfortunate conspiracies in which he had been engaged, for De Blenau to thick with aught but horror, of acting in any way with a man, the weak versatility of whose disposition had already brought more than one of his friends to the scatfold. He therefore waited for the duke's communication, determined to cut it short as soon as propriety admitted; and even to deviate from the respect due to his rank, rather than become the confidant of a prince, whose station was his sole tile to reverence.

"You do not answer me, Monsieur de Blenau," said the duke, after having waited a moment or two for some reply. "Are you, sir, inclined to serve your country ; or is the Cardinal de Richelieu your good frieud ?"

" "That I am inclined to serve my country," replied De Bienau, "your highness need not doubt ; and when my sword can avail that country against a foreign adversary, it shall always be ready at her call. In regard to his eminence of Richelieu, I hope that he is no more my enemy than I am his ; and that he will no more attempt to injure me than I will to injure him."

"But has he not endeavored to injure you atready !" said the duke. " Listen to me, Sir Coont. Suppose that there were many men at this moment well inclined to free France from the yoke that which she labors. Suppose I were to tell yo

"Let me beseech your highness, interposed Blenau, " to tell me no more ; for, if I undersi you rightly, it must be a confidence dangerous ther to you or me-dangerous to you, if I reit; and dangerous to me, if I do not. Pardon my lord, for interrupting you; but let my ears main in their present innocence of what you m What may be your wishes with me, 1 know 1 but before you proceed farther, let me say th will enter into no scheme whatever against a c ernment to which his majesty has given his st tion, and which it is always in his power to a or remove at his pleasure, without any one be entitled to question his authority, either in ran it or casting it down. And now, having venture premise thus much, if I can serve your high personally, in any way where my honor and allegiance are not at all implicated, I shall be n happy in an opportunity of showing my attachm to your royal person and family."

"Why then, Monsieur de Blenan," replied duke, "I think the best thing we can do is to t our horses different ways, and forget that we h met to-day at all. Our conference has been sh but it has been to the purpose. But of course, fore we part, I expect your promise, as a man honor, that you will not betray me.

"I have nothing to betray, 'my lord," replied Blenau with a smile. "We have met on the r to St. Amand. We have not been five minute each other's company. Your highness has told nothing, whatever I may have suspected ; there you may rest perfectly secure that I have not to betray, even if they put me to the torture morrow. But as I think that for your highne sake we had better be as little together as possi I will humbly take my leave."

So saying, De Blenau bowed low, and turn horse towards Moulins, the Duke of Orlean paring to take the other road; but suddenly the latter stopped, and turning his head, asked if De Blenau had gained any news of Mademoiselle de Beaumont.

RICHELIEN,

"I am not aware of what your highness alludes to," replied De Blenau, quickly reining in his horse, retarning to the side of the dake.

"What, then you have not heard-when had you letters from St. Germain ?"

"Heard what? In the name of God, speak, my lord!" cried De Blenau : "Do not keep me in suspense,"

"Nay, Monsieur de Blenau, I know but little," answered the Duke. "All my news came yesterday in a letter from St. Germain, whereby I find that Mademoiselle de Beaumont has disappeared ; and as no one knows whither she is gone, and no cause is apparent for her voluntary absense, it is conjectured that Richelieu, finding, as it is whispered, that she endeavored to convey intelligence to you in the Bastille, has caused her to be arrested and confined au secret."

"But when did she disappear ?--Who saw her last !--Have no traces been discovered ?--Why do they not apply to the king ?" exclaimed De Blenau, with a degree of agitation that afforded amusement, rather than excited sympathy in the frivolous mind of the Duke of Orleans.

"Really, Monsieur de Blenau, to none of all your questions can I at all reply, answered Gaston. " Very possibly, the lady may have gone off with some fair lover, in which case she will have taken care to leave no traces of her flight.—What think you of the weather ?—will it rain to-day ?? " Hell and fury ?" cried De Blenau, incensed at

"Hell and fury ?" cried De Blenau, incensed at the weak triffing of the prince, at a moment when his feelings were so deeply interested: and turning his horse round without farther adieu, he struck bas spurs into the animal's sides, and, followed by S attendants, galloped off towards Moulins. http: at the château which he inhabited, his show were still in such a troubled state as to forb id a calm consideration. "Prepare every thing to so out. Saddle fresh horses. Send to Moulins for th. propriétaire," we-e De Blenau's first commands, des termined at all risks to set out for St. Germain and seek for Pauline himself. But while his order = were in train of execution, reflection came to his aid, and he began to think that the news which the duke had given him might not be true-that Gaston might either be deceived himself, or that he might have invented the story for the purpose of forcing him into a conspiracy against Richelieu's government. "At all events," thought he, " Henry de la Mothe cannot be longer absent than tomorrow. I may miss him on the road, and thus be four days without information instead of one .". Accordingly, after some farther hesitation, he determined to delay his journey one day, and counter ordered the preparations which he had before commanded. Nevertheless, his mind was too much agitated to permit of his resting inactive ; and quitting the château, he walked quickly on the road towards Paris; but he had not proceeded more than a quarter of a league, when from the top of a hill he perceived a horseman coming full speed towards him. At first, while the distance rendered his form altogether indistinct, De Blenau decided that it was Henry de la Mothe-it must be -it could be nobody else. Then again he began to doubt-the horse did not look like his; and De Blonau had almost determined that it was not his page, when the fluttering scarf of blue and gold becoming apparent, decided the question, and he hurried forward, impatient even of the delay which must yet intervene.

The page rode on at full speed; and even from that circumstance De Blenau drew an unfavorable augury : he had something evidently to communicate which required haste. His horse, two, was not the same which had carried him away, and he must have changed him on the road : this too way a sign of that urgent despatch which could alone proceed from some painful cause. However, the page came rapidly forward, recognised his lord, and drawing in his horse, alighted to give relief to De Bleuan's doubts, only by confirming his fears.

RICHELIEF.

His first tidings were perfectly similar to the information which had been given by the Duke of Orleans; but the more minute details which he had obtained, forming a part of the history which he gave De Blezau of all that had occurred to him on his journey, Ishall take the liberty of abridging myself, instead of learing them in a desultory and long-winded condition in which they proceeded from the mouth of Monsieur de In Mothe.

Setting out from Moulins on one of the Count de Blenau's strongest horses, and furnished with pleaty of that patent anti-attrition composition, which has facilitated the progression of all sorts of people in all ages of the world, and in all states except Lycurgus governed Sparta---namely gold, Henry de la Mothe was not long in reaching St. Germain ; and with all the promotitude of his age and nature, he hastened eagerly towards the palace, promising himself infinite pleasure in delivering a genuine love-letter into the fair hands of Mademoiselle Pauline. No small air of consequence, therefore, did he assume in inquiring for Mademoiselle de Benumont, and announcing that he must speak with her himself; but the boyish vivacity of the page was soon changed into sorrowful anxiety. when the old servant of Anne of Austria, to whom his inquiries had been addressed, informed him that the young lady had disappeared, and was nowhere to be heard of Now Henry de la Mothe, the noble Count de Blenau's gay page, was an universal favorite at St. Germain ; so, out of pure kindness, and without the least inclination in the world to gossip, the old servant took him into the palace and after treating him to a cup of old SL wine, told him all about the disappearance of line, which formed a history occupying exactly one hour and ten minutes in delivering.

Among other interesting particulars, he described to the page how he himself had accompanied Mademoiselle de Hauteford and Mademoiselle de Beaumont from Chantilly to Paris, for the purpose. of conveying news to Monsieur de Blenau, in the Bastille ; and how that night he followed the two young ladies as far as the church of St. Gervais, where they separated, and he remained at the church door, while Mademoiselle de Hauteford went in and prayed for the good success of Pauline; -and further, how Mademoiselle de Hauteford said all the prayers she knew, and composed a great many new ones to pass the time, and yet no Pauline returned; and now at last she came out to know what the devil had become of her ;---and how he told her, that he could not tell.

He then went on to describe their search for Paulino, and their disappointment and distress at not finding her, and the insolence of a lying innkeeper, who lived opposite the prison, and who assured him that the young lady was safe, for that he himself had delivered her from peril by the valor of his invincible arm. After this, he took up the pathetic, and showed forth in moving terms the agony and despair of Madame de Beaumont on first hearing of the non-appearance of her daughter; and then commented upon the extraordinary insensibility that she had since shown. " For after two days," said he, "she seemed to grow quite satisfied, and to forget it all, the cold-hearted old — eat."

"This just like her," said Henry de la Mothe.— "They say, when her husband was killed, she never shed a tear. But mark me, Monsieur Mathieu, she shall not have the count's letter. As mademoiselle is not here, I'll take it back to him unopened; so have a care not to tell the old marquise that I have been here. Before I go back, however, I'll away to Paris, to gather what news I can. That aubergiste meant something-I know him well. "Tis old Jacques Chatpillieur, the einandier, who served with the army in Roussillon, when I was there with the count."

RIOHELIEU.

"Well, well, my good youth, go to Paris if you please," replied the old servant. "You'll gain no tidings more than I have given you.-Did not I make all sorts of inquiries myself? and they are not likely to deceive me, I wot. Young birds think they can fly before they can peck; but go, go,you'll gain no more than what I have told you."

Henry de la Mothe did not feel very well assured of the truth of this last position ; and therefore, though his back ached with a four days' ride as fast as he could go, he set out again for Paris, where he arrived before nightfall; and entering the city by the port St. Antoine, directed his course to the house of our doughty friend, Jacques Chatpilleur, where he was instantly acknowledged as an old acquaintance by the worthy aubergiste, and treated with suitable distinction. Although every moment was precious, the page did not think fit to enter upon the business that brought him till the auberge was clear of intruders; and this being the hour at which many an honest burgess of the good city solaced his inward man with boudin blanc and Burgundy, when the fatigues of the day began to cease, Henry de la Mothe thought he might as well follow the same agreeable calling, and while he was at Rome, do as Romans did.

More than an hour passed before the page had an opportunity of communicating fully with the good aubergiste; but when Jacques Chatpilleur heard that the lady he had delivered from the clutches of Letrames, was no less a person than Pauline, only daughter and heiress of the late celebrated Marquis de Beaumont, and that, notwickstanding his assistance, she had somehow been canried off on that identical night, his strange woodcocked-shaped person became agilated with various extraordinary contortions, proceeding from an o mixture of pleasure and grief, which at once took possession of him, and contended for the mastery.

BICHELIEU.

" Mon Dieu!" cried he. " to think that it was Mademoiselle de Beaumont, and that she should be lost after all !" And the aubergiste set himself to think of how it could all have happened. I'll bet a million," cried no at arting from his revery, and clapping his hand 2-ther with a concussion that echoed to the R: in itself-" I'll bet a million that it was ttonous Norman vagabond, who . t est me up a matelot d'angui . He is understrapping cut-tl lavigni, and he has never been some new that her away to some off, for a million; and taken her away to some prison in the provinces, all for trying to give a little news to the good count. But I'll ferret out his route for you. On with your beaver and come with me. Marguerite, look to the doors while I am absent. I know where the scoundrel lodged; so come slong; and we'll soon hear more of him."

So saying, the landlord of the Sanglier Gourmand led Henry de la Mothe forth into the Rue St. Antoine, and thence through the several turnings and windings by which the Norman had carried Pauline to the late lodgings of Monsieur Marteville. Here Jacques Chatpilleur summoned all persons in the house, male and female, lodger and landlord, to give a full, true, and particular account of all they knew, believed, or suspected concerning the tall Norman, who usually dwelt there. And such was the tone of authority which he used. and the frequency of his reference to Henry de la Mothe, whom he always specified as " this honorable youth," that the good folks instantly transformed, in their own imaginations, the page of the Count de Blennu into little less than the valet de chambre of the prime minister, and consequently answered all questions with becoming deference.

The sum of the information which was thus obtained amounted to this, that on the evening in question, Monsieur Marteville had brought thither a young lady-whether by force or not, no one could specify ; that she was dressed as a Languedoc peasant, which Monsieur Chatpilleur acknowledged to be the disguise Pauline had assumed ; and that the same evening he had carried her away again on horseback, leading her steed by the bridle rein. It further appeared that the Norman, while preparing to set out, had asked a great many questions about Troyes in Champagne, and had inquired whether there was not a wood extending over some leagues near Mesnil St. Loup, which was reported to be infested by robbers. From all this the inhabitants of the house had concluded universally that his journey was destined to be towards Troyes, and that he would take care to avoid the wood of Mesnil St. Loup.

Henry de la Mothe now fancied that he had the elew completely in his hands, and returning with Jacques Chatpilleur to his auberge, he took one night's necessary rest, and having exchanged his horse, which was knocked up with its journey, he set out the next morning on his return to Moulins.

After this recital, all considerations of personal salety, the king's commands to remain in Bourbon, the cennity of the cardinal, and the warnings of Chavigni, vanished from the mind of De Blenan like smoke ; and returning to the chitatan, he ordered his horses to be instantly prepared, chose ten of his most resolute servants to accompany him, ordered Henry de la Mothe to remain till he had recovered from his fatigues, and then to return to St. Germain, and tell Madame de Beaumont that he would send her news of her dughter, or loose his life in the search; and having made all other necessary arrangements, he took his departure for Troyes without a consideration of the consequences.

CHAPTER XI.

١

ç

The consequence of fishing in troubled water.

WE must now return to the two worthy personages whom we left jogging on towards the chateau of St. Loup, taking them up at the precise place "Bon gré mal gré va le prêtre au séné," grumbled where we set them down. "Remember, Madame Louise, 1 take you with no good will ' you insist upon going ; so the Norman.

now if you meet with any thing disagreeable, it is your own fault, -mark that, ma poule, "I'm no more afraid of the devil than yourself," answered Louise, pertly ; "and I suppose I shall meet with uo one worse than he is."

"You may," replied the Norman; " but come on, it gets late, and we have no time to spare." The tone of Marteville was not very encouraging; but Louise was resolved not to lose sight of her husband, and being by nature as bold as a lion, ner nussana, and being by nature as bout as a tront she followed on without fear. True it is, that she did not know the whole history of the Socerer's Grove, or perhaps she might have felt some of those imaginary terrors from which hardly a bosom in France was altogether free : although Louise, bred up by Madame de Beaumont, whose strong and masculine mind rejected most of the errors of that age, had perhaps less of the superstition of the age, had permaps reas or of her own class, day than any other person of her own class, The first approach to the Sorcerer's Grove was any thing but terrifying. The road, winding genite down the slope of the hill, entered the forest tween some fine tall trees, which rising out

tract of scanty underwood and open ground, with considerable spaces between each of the boughs. afforded plenty of room for the rich sun to pour his rays between, and to checker the green shadows of the wood with intervals of golden light. Every here and there, also, the declining sunbeams caught upon the old knotted trunks, and on the angles of the broken ground on either side, enlivening the scene without taking from its repose ; and at the bottom of the hill, seen through the arch of boughs which canopied the way, appeared a bright mass of sunshine, with a glimpse of the sky beyond, where a larger open space than ordinary gave free access to the day. From this spot, however, the road, entering the deeper part of the wood, took a direction towards the old château of St. Loup ; and here the trees, growing closer together, began to shut out the rays; gloom and darkness spread over the path, and the rocks rising up into high broken banks on each side, cut off even the scanty light which glided between the thick branches above. At the same time the whole scenery assumed a wilder and more desolate character, and the windings of the road round the base of the hill prevented the eye from catching even a glimpse of the prospect beyond.

Here, strewed upon the path, lay great masses of green mouldy rock, fallen from the banks on each side, evincing plainly how seldom the foot of man traversed its solitude; there again a mundie stream, blood-red, flowed across and tinged all the earth mound with its own unseemly hue; while long brambles and creeping shrubs, dropping with chill dew, grew at the base of the rocks on either side, and shooting out their thorny arms, caught the feet of the horses as they passed. The deep solitude, the profound silence, the shadow of the overhanging woods, and the sombre gloom of every object around, began to have their effect for the mind, of Louise, and notwithstanding her maive buddenses of heart, she set herself to conjune up more that of that qhiet solitude most consonant to his feelings, when he was disturbed by a billet left at his gate by a horseman, who waited not to be questioned, but rode away immediatly after having delivered it. The note itself merely contained a request, that the Count de Blenau would ride in the direction of St. Amand on the following evening, at the hour of four, when he would meet with one who had business of importance to communicate. The handwriting was unknown to him, and de Blenau at first hesitated whether to obey the commons or not but curiosity has a thousand ways of strongthening itsolf, and at has he reasoned himself into a belief, that whatever it might be, no harm could accrue from his compliance.

Accordingly, on the following evening, as the hour drew near, he mounted his horse, and, accompanied by his usual attendants, proceeded towards St. Amand. Having ridden on for more than an hour without meeting any one above the rank of a peasant, he began to accuse himself for having been the dupe of what might prove some foolish joke. He had even reined in his horse with the purpose of returning, when he perceived a person approaching on horseback, who, notwithstanding a sort of carelessness,-even perhaps, slovenliness of manner and carriage-had about him that undefinable air, which in all ages, and in every guisedenotes a gentleman, and a distinguished one. It was not, however, till he came near, that De Blenau recognized Gaston Duke of Orleans, whom he had not seen for some time. The moment he did remember him, he gave him the centre of the road, and saluting him respectfully, was passing on. never dreaming that the summons he had received could have proceeded from him.

"Good day, Monsieur de Bienau. You are close upon the hour," said the duke, drawing up his horse, and at once allowing the rount to understand that it was with him that the appointment had been made.

"I was not aware," replied De Blenau, "that the summons which I received last night was from so honorable a hand, or I should have had no hesitation in obving."

"Why, that is right," said the duke. "The truth is, I wished much to see you, Monsicur le Conte, upon a business wherein you may not only be of much service to yourself and me, but also to your country. We will ride on, if you please; and as we go, I will explain myself farther."

De Blenau turned his horse, and rode with the duke; but the warning which Chavigni had given him, came strongly into his mind; and Gaston of Orleans was too famous for the unfortenate conspiracies in which he had been engaged, for De Blenau to think with aught but horror, of acting in any way with a man, the weak versitility of whose disposition had already brought more than one of his friends to the scaffold. He therefore waited for the duke's communication, determined to cut it short as soon as propriety admitted; and even to deviate from the respect due to his rank, rather than become the confidant of a prince, whose station was his sole tile to revenence.

"You do not answer me, Monsieur de Blenau," said the duke, after having waited a moment or two for some roply. "Are you, sir, inclined to serve your country; or is the Cardinal de Richelien your good friend ?"

"That I am inclined to serve my country," replied De Blenau, "your highness need not doubt ; and when my sword can avail that country against a foreign adversary, it shall always be ready at her call. In regard to his eminence of Richelieu, I hope that he is no more my enemy than I am his; and that he will no more attempt to injure me than I will to injure him."

"But has he not endeavored to injure you already f" said the dake. "Listen to me, Sir Count. Suppose that there were many men at this moment well inclined to free France from the yoke und further effort to allay her fears, sat whistling s horse, till the robber, half-sliding, half-runmanaged to descend from the eminence on h he had first appeared.

Eh bien, Callot," said Monsieur Marteville to ormer companion, "how goes it with the

But badly," replied Callot : "What with one ry or another, we have but half a dozen left." and where is Pierrepont Le Blane?" demandle Norman : "Could not he keep you togeth-h! we have sent him to the kingdom of s, answered the robber, twisting his face into a horrible grin. "First he quarrelled with one, hen be quarrelled with another; and then, as as captain, and had the purse, he bethought of taking himself off with all the treasure. But aught him on the road; and so, as I have said, ent the bucanier on an embassy to the kingof moles. After that, there were two of us near Epernay, by a party of the guard; and six more went to see what could be guathered the road to Perpignan, and one was taken and ed at Troyes; so that there are but myself and whers of the old band left."

nd quite enough too, if you had a bold leadreplied the Norman. "But where do you , mes jolis oiseaux?"

No, no; we do not perch now," answered the er; "we go to earth. Under the old castle are the most beautiful vaults in the world; defy Beelzebub himself to nose us, when we idden there."

But why not take to the château itself ? Is it decayed ?"

Nay," replied the other, "for that matter, it is od a nest as any one would wish to house in: is not quite so forsaken as folks think. We t up there at first; but one night, while all rty were out but three—being myself and two others who staid-we heard suddenly the sound of horses, and looking out, we saw by the twilight five stout cavaliers dismount in the court ; and up they marched to the very room where we were sitting, so that we had scarce time to bundle up our things and to cover. And there they sat for four good hours; while we were shut up in the little watch-tower next to them, with no way to get out, and no powder but what was in our cabines, or may hap we should have given them a dose or two of leaden pills, for at first we thought they were on the look-out for our band. But presently after, up came another, and then they all set to, to talk high-treason. I could not well hear, for the door was so thick, and we d red not move; but I know they spoke of a treaty with Spain, and bringing in Spanish troops into France. Since then, we have "kept to the vaults, for fear of being nosed."

BIOMELIEU -

"Well, Louise," whispered the Norman, turning to the soubrette, "you see I did not come here for no purpose. It is this treaty with Spain I want to find out; and if I do, our fortune is made for ever, and you will eat off gold, and drink out of gold, and be as happy as a princess !"

The prospects which her hasband held out, and which might certainly be called golden, were not without their effect on Louise; but still his evident familiarity with the gentleman in the rusty steel coat did not at all suit her ideas of propriety, nor were the matters which they discussed in the least to her taste; but as remonstrance was in vain, and she began to perceive that the influence of her tears was not very great, she resigned herself to her fate in silence.

Several more questions and replies passed between the Norman and his ancient comrade, which, as they tend to throw no light upon this history, shall not find a place therein. At length Monsieur Callot, in as hospitable and courtly a strain as the could assume, requested the pleasure of Monsieur

RICHELLEU.

Marteville's company to spend the evening in the vaults of the old château, if he had not grown too fine, by living among the great, to associate with his old friends. In return for this, the worthy Norman assured him, that he never was so happy as when he was in their society, accepted the invitation with pleasure, and begged to introduce his wife. Callot would fain have offered his salute to the lips of the fair lady, and had mounted on a huge stone beside her horse for that purpose ; but Louise repulsed him with the dignity of a duchess, and Callot did not press the matter further, merely giving a shrewd wink of the eye and screw of the under-jaw, as much as to say, "she's nice, it seems," and then led the way towards the present abode of Marteville's old band.

The road which he took wound through the very depth of the wood towards that side of the hill which, looking over the wide extent of forest-ground lying between the old castle and the high road to Troyes seemed to offer nothing but dark inaccessible precipices, from the shallow stream that ran bubbling a its base to the walls of the ruin above. Crossing the rivalet, however, which did not rise higher than the horses' knees, the robber led the way round a projecting mass of rocks, that seemed to have been forcibly riven from the rest, and which, through it left space enough for the horses to turn, would have effectually concealed them from the sight of any one who might be in the word.

The two sides of the hill next to the village of Mesnil, and the ridge of rising ground on which it was situated, sloped easily into the valleys around, and were covered with a rich and glowing recenttion; but on the northern as well as the western side, which the Norman and his companions now approached, the rock offered a very different character, and one, indeed, extremely rate in that you of the country.

Wherever the eye turned, nothing prevented itself but flat surfaces of cold gray strate, with the deep markings of the rifts and hollows which separated them from each other. Occasionally, indeed, a patch of thin vegetable earth, accumulating on any point that offered the means of support, yielded a slight gleam of verdue, so poor in hue, and so limited in extent, that it seemed alone to rival the lichens and stains of the rocks around, and to serve but as a mockery of the naked crag that bore it. Here and there too, a black antique pine fixing its sturdy roots in the bleakest pinnacles, would be seen to start boldly out, as if to brave the tempests, that, sweeping over the oaks in the forest below, spent their full fury on its more ambitious head. The principle objects, however, that attracted attention were the multitude of deep fissures and hollows which presinted themselves at every point, and the immense blocks of stone which, scattered about round the base of the rock, offered plentiful means of concealment to any one who might there seek to baffle a pursuer.

Turning, as we have said, round the base of one of these large masses, the robber uttered three load whistles, to give notice that it was a friend approached; and immediately after, from a cavorn, the mouth of which was concealed in one of the fissures above-mentioned, came forth two figures, whose wild apparel corresponded very well with that of their companion.

"Morblas! Monsieur Marteville !" cried one of them, the moment he recognised the Norman, "est ce vous? Soyez le bien venu? Come at a lucky moment for some of the best wine of Bonne! The Gros St. Nicolas-you remember our old companion-he has just returned from the Chemin de Troyes, where he met two charitable monks, who, out of pure benevolence, bestowed upon him three panniers of good wine and twelve broad pueces though they threatened to excommunicate him, we that two who were with him, for holding steels."

However, you are heartily welcome, and the more - so if you are come to stay with us."

"We will talk of that presently," said the Norman. "But in the first place, good friends, tell me, can one get up to the eastle above, which, Callot says, is inbitable yet? for here is my wife, who is not much used to dwell in vanits, and may like a lodging above ground better."

"Oh, certainly ! Madame shall be accommodated," said the last speaker, who seemed to be more civilized than good Monsieur Callot. "Our own dwelling is well enough; but if she please, I will show you up the staircase which leads from the vaults to the court above. However, I hope, she will stay to partake of our supper, which is now before the fire, as you shall see."

"She shall come down again," said the Norman, dismounting, and lifting Louise out of the saddle, " and will thank you for your good cheer, for we have ridden far." So saying, he followed into the cave, which at first presented nothing but the natural ruggedness of the rock ; but at that spot where the daylight began to lose its effect in the increasing darkness of the cavern, one might perceive, though with difficulty, that it assumed the form of a regular arch cased with masonry; and in a moment or two, as they proceeded groping their way after the robber, they were warned that there were sleps : mounting these, and turning to the left, they discerned, at alittle distance in advance, a bright red light streaming from behind a projecting angle, which itself remained in utter obscurity. The robber here went on first, and they heard him announce in a loud and jocular tone, "Le Sieur Marleville, et Madame sa femme !" with as much ceremony as if he had been heralding them into the presence of royalty.

"Bah? rows plaisanter !"cried a thick merry voice, eseming as if it issued from the midst of stewad prunes. But the Norman sdvancing, bore evidence of the truth of the other's annuaciation, and was instantly caught in the arms of the Gros St. Nic-and protuberant, with a face an round moon, and as rosy as a piony. In fact, much better fitted for a burgess or a price keeper or an alderman, than for the thin a trade of a cut-purse, which seldom leaves bat bones to be hanged at last. However, him jollily ; and, when the party entered, morion and breast-plate thrown aside, en basting a large quarter of venison, which before a stupendous fire, whose blaze illumi the wide rault, which formed their salle .d and kitchen both in one. " Est-il possible ?" cried the Gros St. Nico. bracing our Norman, whose companion he ha for many years both in honorable and dishol trades :- Mon ami !. Mon Capitain ! . Mon Mon Prince ! Enfor, mon Norman !! Quitting the ecstacies of the Gros St. Nic at meeting once more with his friend, and th malities of his introduction to Louise, we shall my that, according to the request of the taircase in the rock the government; and that Monsieur de Chavigni has intrusted me to discover it. You heard what Callot said, concerning a treaty with Spain Now I have always understood, that when these secret treaties are formed, a copy is deposited in some uninhabited place for greater security. You see, T have traced Fontrailles to this castle, and it is evident that here he met the other conspirators : now where, then, can they have secreted the treaty but somewhere about here ? So now, Louise, help me to find this paper, if it is to be found; and then we will soon quit these men, of whom you seem so much afraid, and ge and live like princes on the fortane that Chavigni has promised."

RICHELLED,

To this long speech of her husband, which he accompanied with sundry little carresses, Louise replied, in a tone half sulky, that she was ready to seek the paper, but she did not see how they could find it, with nothing togaide them in their search. But nevertheless, when they did seriously begin their perquisitions, she displayed all that sagacity in discovering a secret which women instinctively possess. Of course, the first place to which they particularly directed their inquiries was the chamber in which, according to the account of Callot, the meeting of the conspirators had been held.

Here they looked in every nook and corner, turned over every heep of rabbish, examined the chaira and the table of old Pere Le Ronge and having gone over every inch of the apartment, began anew and went over it all again. At length Louise, seemingly ined of her search in that chamber, left her husband to pursue it as he pleased, and sitting down in one of the seitles, began to hum a Languedoc air, beating time with her fingers on the table.

" Pardi " cried the Norman, after having hunted for some time in vain : " it is not here, that is certain !"

"Yes, it is " said Louise, very quietly continuing to bent time on the table ; "it is in this very room."

"Nom de Dieu! where is it then ?" cried Monsieur Marteville.

" It is here, in the inside of this hollow piece of wood," answered Louise, tapping the table with her knuckles, which produced that sort of empty echoing sound that evinced it was not so solid as it appeared.

The Norman now approached, and soon convincing himself that Louise was right, he took her in his arms and gave her a kiss that made the ruin echo.

The next thing was to get into the drawer, or whatsoever it was, that occupied the interior of the table : but this not proving very easy, the impatient Norman set it upright on one end, and drawing his sword, soon contrived to cleave it through the middle; when, to the delight of the eyes that looked upon it, appeared a large cavity neatly wrought in the wood, containing a packet of vellum folded and sealed at the corners in blue and yellow war, with neat pieces of floss-silk to keep it all together. The Norman could have eaten it up; and Louise, with a degree of impatient curiosity peculiarly her own, was already fingering one of the seals, about to break it open, when Marteville stopped her with a tremendous oath. " What are you going to do ?" cried he : "you know little what it is to pry into state secrets. If you had opened that seal, instead of having perhaps a reward of twenty thousand crowns, we should have both been sent to the Bastille for the rest of our lives." Louise dropped the packet in dismay; and the Norman continued, "Did you never hear of the Abbé de Langy, who, happening to be left by Monsieur de Richelieu in his private cabinet only for five minutes, with some state papers on the table, was sent to the Bastille for twelve years, merely for fear he had read them? No, no; this must go to Monsieur Chavigni without so much as cracking the wax."

"Could not we just look in at the end ?" demanded Louise, looking wistfully at the packet, which her husband had now picked up. But apon this be put a decided negative ; and having now succeeded to his heart's content, the burly N rman, in the exuberance of his joy, began singing and capering till the old nile both echoed and shook with his gigantic gambols. "Ma Louise," cried he at length, "vous Etes fatigude. Je vais vous porter ;" and catching her up in his arms, notwithstanding all remonstrances, he carried her like a feather into the court-vard, through the narrow arch, and threading all the intricacies of the vaults with the same segacious facility with which a ferret glides through the windings of a warren, he bare her safely and in triumph into the salle a manger of the honorable fraternity below. This was not the mode of progression which Louise most admired, nor was she very much gratifiel at being exhibited to her hashand's old friends in so ungraceful an attitude ; and the consequences, of course, were, that she would willingly have torn his eyes out had she dared.

However, Monsieur Callot, Le Gros St. Nicolas, and others, applied themselves successively to sooth her ruffled spirits ; and the venison being ready, and a long table laid, each person drew forth their knife, and soon committed infinite havoc on the plump haunch which was placed before them. The wine succeeded, and then that water of life which very often ends in death. All was hilarity and mirth, song, jest, and laughter. Gradually, one barrier after another fell, as cup succeeded cup. Each one told his own story, without regard to the rest; each one sang his own song ; each one cracked his own joke, Louise had retired to a settle by the side of the fire, but still mingled in the conversation, when it could be called such ; and Monsieur Callot, somewhat full of wine, and a good deal smitten with her chavins, plied her with assiduities rather more perhaps than was necessary. In the the meantime, the Gros St. Nio Ins, running over with brandy and good spirits, kept josting the Norman upon some passages of his. former life, which might as well have been passed over and forgotten. "Madame !" cried he at length, turning round towards Louise, with an overflowing goblet in his hand, and his broad face full of glee, "I have the honor of drinking to your health, as the fifth spouse of our good friend Monsieur de Marteville; and lot me assure you, that of the three that are living and the two that are dead, to: are the most beautiful heyond compare ?"

Up started Louise in an acony of indignation, and forth she poured upon the Gros St. Nicolas a torrent of vituperation for jesting upon such a subject. But on his part he only shrugged his shoulders, and declared that he did not jest at all. "Mon Dieu!" soid he, "it is very unreasonable to suppose that Monsieur Marteville, who is as hig as five men, should be contented with one wife. Besides, it is très agréable to have a wife in every province ; I always do so mysell."

The thunder of Louise's ire, now increased in a seven-fold degree, was turned instantly upon her dearly beloved husband. Her eyes flashed and her cheek flamed, and approaching him, where he sat laughing at the whole business, she demanded that he should exculpate himself from this charge of pentigamy, with a tone and manner that made the Norman, who had drunk quite enough, laugh still more. With an unheard-of exertion of self-command, Louise kept her fingers from his face : she burst forth into reproaches so bitter and stinging, that Marteville's mirth was soon converted into' rage, and he looked at her with a glance which would quickly have taught those woo knew him well not to urge him further. . But Louise went on, and wound up by declaring, that she would live with him no longer-that she would quit him that very moment, and finding her way to Monsieur Chavigni, would tell him all-adding that she would soon send. the guard to ferret out that nest of ruffians, and that she hoped to see him hanging at the head of the With this expression of her intentions, Louise i ed out of the yault; but the Norman, who se clenched, and his nether lip quivering with suppressed passion, started suddenly up, cast the settle from him with such force that it was dashed to pieces against the wall, and strode after her with the awful cloud of determined wrath settled upon his brow.

RICHELLEU,

The mirth of the robbers, whe knew the ungovernable nature of their companion's passion, wow now over, and each looked in the face of the other with silent expectation. After a space, there was the murmur of angry voices heard for a moment at the farther end of the passage; then a loud piercing shriek rang through the valt; and then all was silence. A momentary sensation of horror ran through the bosoms of even the ferocious men whose habits rendered them familiar with almost every species of bloodshed. But this was new and strange among them, and they waited the return of the Norman with feelings near akin to awe.

At length, after some time, he came with a firm step and unblenching brow, but with a haggard wildness in his eye which seemed to tell that remorse was busy with his beart. However, he sat him down without any allusion to the past, and draining off a cup of wine, strove laboriously after merriment. But it was in vain ; the mirth of the whole party was evidently forced ; and Marteville soon took up another strain, which accorded better with the feelings of the moment. He spoke to them of the dispersion of the band, which had taken place since he left them ; announced his intention of joining them again; and drawing forth a purse containing about a thousand livres, he poured them forth upon the table, declaring them to be his first offering to the treasury.

This magnificent donation, which came in aid of their finances at a moment when such a recruit was very recessary, called forth loud shouts of applaase from the freemen of the forest; and the Gros St. Nicelas starting up, addressed the company much to the following effect: "Measieurs-every one knows that I am St. Nicolas, and no one will deay that I am surrounded by a number of goodly clerks. But although in my saintly character, I will give up my clerical superiority to nobody; yet it appears to me, that our society requires some lay commander; therefore I, your bishop, do propose to you to elect and choose the Sieur Marteville, here present, to be our king, and captain in the wars, in room of the Sieur Pierrepont Le Blane, who, having abdieated without cause, was committed to the castody of the great receiver-general--the earth, by warrant of cold iron and pistol-balls. What say ye, Messieurs, shall he be elected 7"

A shout of approbation was the reply ; and Marteville, having been duly elected, took the oaths, and received the homage of his new subjects. He then entered into a variety of plans for increasing the band, concentrating its operations, and once more rendering it that formidable body which it had been in former times. All this met with the highest approbation ; but the captain showing the most marked dislike to remaining in the forest which they at present tenanted, and producing a variety of reasons for moving their quarters to Languedoc, where the neighborhood of the court and the army offered greater facilities both for recruiting their numbers and their purses, it was agreed that they should disperse the next morning, and reassemble as soon as possible, at a certain spot well known to the whole party, about forty inagues distant from Lyons.

This was happily effected ; and the Norman, on presenting himself at the rendexyous, had the pleasure of introducing to the band two new associates, whom he had found the means of converting on the road.

Although abandoning himself heart and soul to the pleasures of his resumed profession, our friend Marteville was not forgetfal of the rewards be expected from Chavigni; and as his official double prevented his being himself the bearer of the pape he had obtained, ha despatched it to Support where the statesman now was, by his faithful subject Callot, with orders to demand ten thousand crowns of Monsieur de Chavigni, as a reward for having discovered it, adding also an elaborate epistle to the same effect.

The Norman never for a moment entertained a suspicion that the paper he sent was any thing but the identical treaty with Spain, which the conspirators had been heard to mention; and he doubted not that the statesman would willingly pay such a sum for so precious a document. But the embassy of Monsieur Callot did not prove so fortunate as had been anticipated. Presenting himself to Chavigni, with as much importance of aspect as the ambassador from Sizen, he tendered his credentials, and demanded the reward, at a moment when the statesman was irritated by a thousand anxieties and dangers.

Making no ceremony with the line blue and yellow wax. Chavigai, having read the Norman's epistle, soon found his way into the inside of the other packet, and beheld in the midst of a thousand signs and figures, unintelligible to any but a professed astrologer, a prophetic scroll containing some doggrel verses, which may be thus rendered into English --

THE FATE OF RICHELIEU.

Born beneath two mighty stars, Mercury with Mars combined, He shall prompt a thousand wars, Nor live the balm of peace to find.

Less than a king, yet kings shall fall And tremble at his fatal sway; Yet at 10%'s end he shall recall The memory of no happy day.

And the last year that he shall know, Shall see him fall, and see him rise;

RIOHALLEU.

Shall see him yield, yet slay his foe, And scarcely triumph ere he dies.

Begot in factions, nursed in strife, Till ell his troubled years be past, Cunning and care eat up his life, A slave and tyrant first and last.

PERE LE ROUGE.

149

Chavigni gazed at the paper in amazement, and then at the face of Monsieur Callot, who, totally unconscious of the contents, remained very nonchalantly expecting the reward. "Ten thousand crowns?" cried the statesman, giving way to his passion. "Ho! without there I take this fellow out and flog him with your hunting whips out of Narbonne. Away with him, and curry him weil !"

The grooms instantly seized upon poor Gallot, and executed Chavigni's commands with high glee. The robber, however, though somewhat surprised, bore his flaggellation very patiently; for under the jerkin which he wore, still hay the rust iron coralet we have before described, which saved him from appreciating the blows at their full value.

"The matter, however, was yet to be remembered, as we shall see; for when Callot, on his return to the forest, informed his captain what sort of reward he had received for the packet, the Norman's gigantic limbs seemed to swell to a still greater size with a passion, and drawing his sword he put the blade to his lips, swearing, that before twelve months were over, it should drink Chavigni's blood : and promises of such sort he usually kept most punctually.

RICHELTER

160

CHAPTER XII.

Wherein Do Blen a finds out that he has made a mistake, and what follows.

HAVING now conductor the Sicur Marte the rest of the ch comes us to show principal actions to display the cau de Chavigni to such actions gotten friend n advance of history, it bedetailing the ges, and also noble Count de Chavigni to such and any and any and a little town in the southern nook of Languedoc, not above a few leagues from Perpignan. However, as all these circumstances are naturally explained in 'the history of the Count de Blenau, we may as well follow him on the useless pursuit into which he had been led by the precipitancy of monsieur Henry de La Mothe, his page, who would have saved his master a great deal of trouble and distress, as we all know, if he had thought fit to see the Marquise de Beaumont; but young hounds will often ery upon a wrong scent, and mislead those who should know better.

Thus it happened in the present instance; and De Blenau, blinded by anxiety for Pauline, took the suspicions of his page for granted, without examination. He knew that Chavigni scrupled not at any measures which might serve a political purpose; he knew that the Norman was in the immediate employment of the statesman, and was still less delicate in his notions than his master; and he doubted not that Pauline, having been discovered issuing from the Bastile, had been carried off without ceremony, and sent from Paris under the sustody of the ci-devant robber. At all events, De Ulenau, as he rode along, composed a very plausible tain of reasoning upon the subject; and far from prossing that the Norman would avoid the wood in the neighbourhood of Mesuii, he concluded, from his knowledge of Marteville's former habits, that a forest filled with robbers would fulfil all his anticipations of paradise, and be too strong an attraction to be resisted.

Thus cogitating, he rode on to Decize, and thence to Corbigny, where day once more broke upon his path; and having been obliged to allow the horses a few hours' rest, he tried in vain for some repose himself. Auxerre was his next halt, but here only granting his domestics one hour to refresh, he passed the Yonne, and soon after entered Champague, which traversing without stopping, except for a few minutes at Bar sur Seine, he reached Troyes before mindight, with man and horse too wearied to begin their search before the following morning.

It unluckily so happened that Do Blenau did not alight at the hotel of the Grand Soleil, where he might have gained such information as would in all probability have prevented his farther proceedings ; and as the keeper of the aberge where he stopped was at open war with the landlord of the Grand Soleil, to all the inquiries which were made the next morning, the only reply the aubergiste thought fit to give was, that "indeed he could not tell; he had never seen such a person as De Blenau described the Norman to be, or such a lady as Pauline;" though he it remarked, every body in the house, after having gazed at Marteville and Louise for a full hear on their arrival, had watched their motions every day, and had wondered themselves stiff at who they could be and what they could want. At length, however, De Blenau caught hold of an unsophisticated hostler, of whom he asked if within the last ten days he had see a carriage stop or pass through the town, containing two such persons as

The hostler replied, "No; that they soldom set carriages there; that a tall gentleman, like the one he mentioned, had ridden out of the town jert of days before with slady on horsebuck; but days carriage had their been in Troyes for more, except that of Monseigneur the g

152

De Blenau, glad, of the least intim news seemed so scanty, now described as particularly as he could from what h of him while speaking to Chavigni in th Germain's, dwelling upon his gigantic and the remarkable cut upon his check

"Yes, ves!" replied the hostler, " man ; I saw him ride out with a joile , the road to Mesnil St. Loup; but dev has there been in Troyes for six yea except that of Monsiegneur the governor

"Well, well," replied De Blenau, wis sible to hear more, "perhaps they migh a carriage. But can you tell me where while in the city of Troyes?"

Even the obtuse faculties of the host drilled into knowing nothing of any ot in the town but his own. "Can't tell," "Saw him and the lady ride out on hors devil a carriage has there been in Tr years or more, except that of Monseigne ernor."

It may have been remarked, that a cer of impatience and hastiness of determione of the prevailing faults of De Blen: tion; and in this case, without writing examination, he set out in pursuit of the soon as his horses were ready, merely there was any castle in the neighborho nil which might serve for the confineme prisoners.

The landlord, to whom the question w ed, immediately determined in his own De Blenau was an agent of the governme plied, "None, that he knew of, but the c of St. Loup; but that Monseigneur had it repaired before he confined any one was so ruinous they would get out, to if they were placed there in its present

RICHELIED.

De Blenau smiled at the mistake, but prepossessed with the idea that the Norman was carrying Pauline to some place of secret imprisonment, he determined at once to proceed to the spot the *au*bergiste mentioned, and to traverse the wood from the high road to Troyes, as the most likely route on which to encounter the Norman, against whom he yowed the most summary vengeance, if fortune should afford him the opportunity.

As, from every report upon the subject, the forest had been for some time past the resort of banditti, De Beinau gave orders to his servants to hold themselves upon their guard, and took the precaution of throwing forward two of his shrewdest followers, as a cort of reconnoiring party, to give him intelligence of the least noise which could indicate the presence of any human being besides themselves. But all these measures seemed to be unnecessary; not a sound met the ear; and De Blemau's party soon began to catch glimpess of the old château of St. Loup, through the breaks in the wood; and gradually winding round towards the east, gained the slope which gave them a clear view of the whole building.

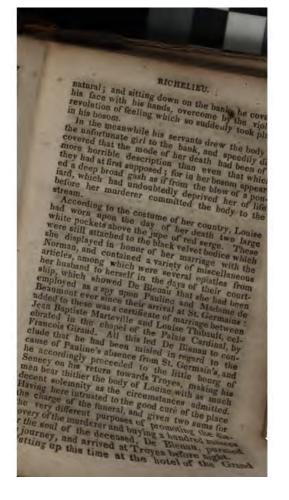

The whole appearance of the place was so desointe and dilapidated, that the first glance convinced De Blenau that Chavigni would never dream of confining Pauline within such runous walls ; as the mere consideration of her rank would prevent him from using any unnecessary severity, though her successful attempt to penetrate into the Bauille afforded a plausible excuse for removing her from Paris. However, in order not to leave the least doubt upon the subject, he mounted to the courtyard, and having ascertained that every part of the building was equally unfit for the purposes of a prisoowls and ravens, he determined to cross to fown, the spire of whose church he come remove

VOL. IL.

hilr of a yound with the second secon

In the mean while the hair waved slowly wards and forwards upon the stream, and one servants perceiving it, dismounted from his 1 waded into the water, and catching it in his g began dragging the body to which it was attitowards the brink. As he did so, the part of serge dress, such as that in which Pauline had ed the Bastille, Boated to the surface, and offehorrible confirmation of De Blenau's fears. first shock, however, was passed, and leaping his horse with agony deputed in his straining he sprang down the bank into the stream, raising the face of the dead person above the w beheld the countenance of Louise.

Perhaps the immoderate joy which De felt at this sigh! might be wrong, but

RIOHELILU

Soleil, De Blenau soon acquired sufficient information to comfirm him in the opinion that the Norman had been accompanied by Louise alone; but at the same time, the accounts which the people of the house gave respecting the kindness and affection that Marteville had shown his bride, greatly shook the suspicions which had been entertained against him by De Blenau, who, unequainted with any such character as that of the Norman, knew not that there are men who, like tigers when unurged by hunger, will play with their victims before they destroy them.

The next morning early, all was prepared for the departure of De Blenau, on his return to Moulins, when his fartner progress in that direction was arrested by the arrival of Henry de La Mothe, his page, accompanied by one of the king's couriers, who immediately presented to the count two packets, of which he had been the bearer from St. Germain's. The first of these seemed, from the superscription, to be a common official document ; but the second attracted all his attention, and made his heart beat high by presenting to him the gennine handwriting of Paulline de Beaumont, Without meaning any offence to royalty, whose insignia were impressed upon the seal of the other packet. De Blenau cagorly cut the silk which fastened the billet from Pauline. It contained only afew lines, but, these were quite sufficient to give renewed happiness to the heart of him who read it. She had just heard, she said, that the king's messenger was about to set out, and though they hardly gave hen time to fold her paper, yet she would not let any one be before her in congratulating him on his. freedom to direct his course wheresoever he pleased. She could not divine, she continued, whether his choice would lead him to St. Germain's, but if it did, perhaps he might be treated to the history of an errant demoiselle, who had suffered various adventures in endeavoring to liberate her true knight from prison.

Be Blenau read it over again, and then turned to the other paper, which merely notified that the king, contented with his royal and peaceable behaviour while relegate in Bourbon, and been graciously pleased to relieve him from the restrictions under which he had been placed for his own benefit and the state's security; and informed him, in short that he had leave, liberty, and licence, to turn his steps, whithersoever he listed.

"To St. Germain's ?" cried De Blenau, gayly. "To St. Germain's!" You, Henry de La Molhe, stay here with Francçois and Clement. Take good care of Monsieur l'Ordinarie, and see that he be rewarded."—The messenger made him a reverence.— "After you have reposed yourself here for a day," continued the count, " netum to Mollins; pay nobre propriétaire, and all that may be there due. There is the key of the coffre fort. Use all speed that you well may, and then join me at home. And now for St. Germain's."

So saying he sprang on his horse as light as air, gave the well-known signal with his heel, and in a moment was once more on the road to Paris.

Although I find a minute account of De Blenau's whole journey to St. Germain's with the towns and inns at which he stopped, marked with the precision of a road-book, I shall nevertheless take upon myself the responsibility of abridging it as far as well can be, by saying that it began and ended happily.

The aspect of St. Germain's, however, had very much changed since De Blenau left it. Louis had now fixed his residence there; his confidence in the queen seemed perfectly restored; every countenance glowed with that air of satisfaction, which such a renewal of good intelligence naturally produced; and the royal residence had once wate wate sumed the appearance of a court.

The first welcome received by De Blenan with from his gallant friend Cinq Mars, at whose recovery his recall had been granted by the king, and now, calculating the time of the exile's return, stood at the door of De Blenau's hotel, ready to meet him on his arrival.

RICHELIES.

"Welcome, welcome back1 my long-lost friend Claude de Blenau," exclaimed Cinq Mars, as the count sprang from his horse ; " welcome from the midet of prisons and trials, perils and daugers."

"And well met galiant Cinq Mars, the noble and the true," replied De Blenau. "But tell me, in heaven's name, Cinq Mars, what makes all this change at St. Germain's 7 Why, it looks as if the forest were a fair, and that the old town had put on its holiday sait to come and see it."

"Nay, hay ! rather like a true dame that dressesherself out for her lover's return, it has made itself fine to receive you back again, replied the master of the horse. "But if you would really know the secret of all the change that you see now, and will are still more wonderfully as you look farther, it is this. Richelieu is ill at Tarascon, and his name is scarcely remembered at the coart, though Chavigni, that bold rascal, and Mazarin, that subtle one, come prowling about to maintain, if possible, their master's sway. But the spell is broken, and Louis is heginning to be a king again : so we shall see bright days yet."

"I hope so; in truth I hope so, Cinq Mars," replicd De Blenau. "But at all events, we will enjoy the change so far as it has gone. And now, what news at the palace 7 How fare all the lovely ladies of the court ?"

"Why well," answered Cinq Mars; " all well; though I know, De Blenau, that your question, in comprising a hundred, meant but one only. Well, what say you ?--I have seen thy Pouline, and cannot but allow that thy taste is marvellous good. There is a wild grace about her, well worth all the formal dignity of a court. One gets tired of the still coursesy and the precise bow; the kissing of hunds and the lisping of names; the monarigneurings and the madamings. Fie ! one little touch of nature is worth it all."

RICHELLEU.

¹⁰ But answer me one question, Monsieur le Grand," suid De Blenau. "How came there a report about, that Pauline had been carried off by some of the cardinal's people, and that no one knew where she was? for such a tale reached me even in Bourbon."

" Is it possible that you are the last to hear that story?" exclaimed Cinq Mars. "Why, though the old marquise, and the rest at the palace, affect to keep it a secret, every one knows the adventures of your demoiselle errante."

De Blennu's cheek flushed to hear such a name applied to Pauline; but Cinq Mars continued, observing that his friend was hurt-" Nay; nay, every one admires her for the whole business, and no one more than I. But, as I was saying, all the world knows it. The queen herself told it to Monsieur de Lomenie, and he to his consin De Thou, and De Thou to me; and so it goes on. Well, but I must take up the gossip's tale at the beginning. The queen, wishing to communicate with you in prison, could find no messenger, who, for either gold or fair words, would venture his head into the rattrap, except your fair Pauline; and she, it seems, attempted twice to get into the Bastille, once by day and once at night, but both times fruitlessly. How it happened I hardly remember, but by some means Chavigni, through some of his creatures, winded the whole allair; and, posting from Chantilly to Paris, calches my fair lady in the very effort, disguised as a soubrette ; down he pounces, like a falcon on a partridge, and having secured the dolinquent, places her in a carriage, which, with the speed of light, conveys her away to his eastle in Maton, where Mindame in Cointesse de Chavignowho, by the way, is an angel according to all accounts-receives the young lady and entertains her with all kindness. In the mean while, Monster, le Compte de Blenau is examined by the kins person, and instead of having his bead cut off, is merely relegue in Bourbon: upon which Chavigni finds he has lost his labour, and is obliged to send for the pretty prisoner back again with all speed.¹⁹

Although 'De Bleuau was aware, from his own personal experience, that Cinq Mars had mistaken several parts of his history, he did not think fit to set him right; and the master of the horse proceeded: "However, let us into thy hotel. Get thy dinner, wash the dust from thy beard, array thyself in an unsullied doublet, and we will hie to the dwelling of thy lady fair, to glad her eyes with the sight of thy sweet person."

De Blenau smiled at his friend's raillery, and as the proposal very well accorded with his wishes, every moment seeming misspent that detained him from Pauline, he changed his dress as speedilv as possible, and was soon ready to accompany Cinq Mars to the palace.

As they proceeded on their way towards the gates of the park, a figure presented itself, which, from its singularity, was worthy of notice. It was that of a tall, thin, raw-boned man, who, naturally possessing a countenance of the ugliest cast of Italan ugliness, had rendered it still more disagreeable by the enormous length of his mustachios, which would have far overtopped his nose, had it been a nose of any ordinary proportion ; but a more extensive, pear-shaped, ill-adapted organ never projected from a human countenance ; and this, together with a pair of small, flaming black eyes, which it seemed to bear forward with it above the rest of the face, protruding from a mass of beard and hair, instantly reminding the beholder of a badger looking out of a hole. The chin, however, bore no proportion to the nose, and seemed rather to slink away from it in an oblique direction, apparently overawed by its more ambitious neighbour.

The dress of this delectable personage was a medicy of the French and Flemish costumes. He wore a gray vest of silk, with sleaves elashed a the elbow, and the shirt, which was not conspicuously clean, buttoned at the wrist with agate studs. His Haule de chausse, which was of deep crimson. and bore loops and ribands of yellow, was fringed round the leg, near the knees, with a series of brazen tags or points but indifferently silvered ; and as he walked along with huge steps, these aforesaid tags clattered together with a sort of important sound, which, put in combination with the rest of his appearance, drew many a laugh from the boys of St. Germain's. Over his gray vest was drawn a straightcut doublet of yellow silk, without sleeves; and a pair of long boots, of untanned leather, covered all defects which might otherwise have been apparent . in his hose. His dress was completed by a tawdry bonnet with a high black plume; and a Toledo blade of immeasurable length, with a worked iron hilt and black scabbard hung by his side, describing with its point various strange figures on the dust of the road.

"Here comes Villa Grande, the Italian luteplayer," exclaimed Cinq Mars the moment he saw him. "Do you know him, De Blensu ?"

"I have heard him play on his instrument and sing at your house," replied De Blenau; " and from his language that night, may say I know him through and through, for a boasting coxcomb, with as much courage as the sheath of a rapier-which looks as good as a rapier itself till it is touched, and then it proves all emptiness. Mind you how he boasted of having routed whole squadrons when he served in the Italian horse ? and I dare say he would run from a staffed pikeman in an old hall."

"Nay, nay; you do him wrong, Claude," replied Cinq Mars. "He has rather too much tongue, it is true; but that is not always the sign of a bad hound. I must speak to him, however, for he does me service. Well, Signor Villa Grand," continues he addressing the Italian, who now approached, series ing an enormous same in his hand, and from to to time curling up the end of his must achieve a remember that you are to be ready at a moment's notice. Be sure, also, that your mind be made up; for I tell you fairly, the service which you undertake is one of danger?"

"Monsieur," replied the Italian with a strong foreign accent, "I will be ready, when you call upon me, in shorter time than you' could draw your sword ; and as for my mind being made up, if there were an army drawn out to oppose my progress, I would be bound to carry the despatch to the Duke of Bouillon, or die in the attempt. Fear not my yielding it to any body; piutosto morir vol' io, as the song has it," and he hummed a few bars of one of his native airs. "Oh Dio !" continued he, recognising De Blenau, who had turned away on perceiving that Cinq Mars spoke to the Halian on some business of a private nature. " Oh Dio! Monsieur le Counte de Blenau, is it really you returned at last ? Benedetto quel giorno felice ? Doubtless you are aware of the glorious plans of your friend Monsieur le Grand,"

"Good day, signor," answered De Bienau; "I know of no one's plans but my own, the most glorious of which, within my apprehension at present, is to get to the palace as soon as possible. Come, Cinq Mars, are you at leisure !" and he took a step or two in advance, while the master of the horse gave the Italian a warning to pat a bridle on his tongue, and not to let in run so loosely without any regard to necessary caution.

"For Heaven's sake, take care what you are about, Cinq Mars!" said De Blenau, when he was again joined by his friend. "Of course you are the best judge of your own plans; but unless you have a mind to ruin them all, do not trust them to such a babbling idiot as that; and beware that, in attempting to catch a lion, you do not get tern yourself?"

"Oh. no lear," replied the grand ecuyer; "that fellow knows nothing more than it is absolutely necessary for him to know; and as for the rest, a have plunged into a wide sea, Claude, and must swim to land somehow."

They had by this time reached the gates on the palace, and Cinq Mars, knowing that some meetings are better in private, left his friend, and turned his steps towards the apartments of the king.

In the mean while, De Blenau proceeded with a rapid pace towards that part of the palace which had been assigned to Madame de Beaumont ; and his heart beat with that wild uncontrollable emotion, which the meeting with one dearly loved can alone produce. At that very moment similar sensations were throbbing in the bosom of Pauline de Beaumont, who from the window had seen the approach of Cinq Mars and another ; and long before her eye could distinguish a feature, her heart had told her who it was, A sort of irresistible impulse lcd her, at first, to fly towards the door by which she expected him to enter ; but before she was haif across the room, some other feeling came over her mind. She returned to her seat at the window, and a blush stole over her cheek, though there was no other person present to observe her emotion or pry into its cause.

The door was partially open, and more than once she raised her eyes towards i', and thought that De Blenau was long in coming so short a distance. But presently she heard his step, and there was an impatient eagerness even in the sound of his footfall that convinced her he lost no time. Another moment and he entered the room—every feeling but one was at an end, and Pauline was in his arms.

It is not at the moment when a lover has endured many sorrows, and escap d from many dangers, that a geable heart can practise even the every-day alfectations which a great part of the world are pleased to mistake for delicacy; and far less inclined to attempt it than any other person in the world, was Pauline de Beaumont. The child of nature and simplicity, her delicacy was that of an elegant more and a pure heart. Of what she did feel she see little, and affected nothing ; and De Blenau ppy.

BICHELIEU.

It is precisely at such moments as those when we wish every hold h = es away, that the world is most li pon us; and Pauline and De Ble it more than five minutes, as it se hen the queen and Madame De Be _____d hen the queen and

How long they had been really together is another question, for lovers' feelings are not always the truest watches.

"Welcome, my faithful De Blenau," said the queen. "We encountered the grand ecuyer but now, who told us where we should find you. For my own part, I suppose I must in all justice forgive your paying your devoirs here before you came to visit even.me. However, ere there be any one near to overhear, I must thank you for all you have done for me, and for all you have suffered on my account. Nor must I forget my little heroine here, who went through all sorts of peril and danger in conveying my message to you in the Bastille."

" Your majesty was very good in sending mesuch an angel of comfort," replied De Blenau. "And certainly, had it not been for the commands she brought me. I believe that his most Christian-like eminence of Richelieu would have doomed me to the torture for my obstinace."

"Put it in other words, De Blenau," said Anne of Austria. "You mean that you would have endured the torture somet than betray your queen. But traly, Pauline must have a stout heart to have carried through such an undertaking; and I think that the fidelity and attachment which you have both shown to me, offers a fair promise for your conduct to wards each other. What say you, Madame de Beaumont ?"

1....

RICHELIES.

"I think, madame, replied the marchioness, " that Paoline has done her duty with more firmness than most girls could have commanded : and that De Blenan has done his as well as it could be done."

"Pauline merits more praise than her mother ventures to give," said the queen. "But I had forgot the king's summons; and probably he is even now waiting for us. Come, Pauline; come, De Blenau. Louis gives high commendation to your demennor in prison; let us see how he greets you out of it."

A message had been conveyed to Anne of Austria, just before the arrival of De Blenau, intimating that the king had desired to see her; and she now led the way to the Salle Ronde, as it was then called, or the Salle des Muses, as it was afterward named by Louis the Fourteenth, where the king waited her approach. Although the uncertain nature of Louis's temper always made her feel some degree of apprehension when summoned to his presence, the kindness he had lately shown hor, and the presence of a large proportion of her friends, made her obey his call with more pleasure than she usually felt on similar occasions.

Louis's object, in the present instance, was to inform the queen of the journey he was shout to make into the neighbourhood of Perpignan, in order to confirm the inhabitants of Roussillon in their new allegiance to the crown of France; and Cinq Mars, who had always sincerely wished the welfare of Anne of Austria, took this opportunity of insinuating to the king, that to show publicly his restored confidence in the queen, so far from lessening his authority, even in appearance, would be in truth only asserting his own dignity, from which the proceedings of Richelieu had so greatly derogaved.

De Blenan and Pauline followed a step or two behind the queen and Madame de Beaumon, an would willingly have lingered still longer by the selves ; but as something must always be sacrificed to appearance, they quickened their pace as Anne of Austria approached the door of the Salle Ronde, and came up with her just as she entered the room in which the principal part of the French court was assembled. The moment she appeared, Louis advanced towards the queen from the brilliant circle in which he stood, and embraced her affectionately. "Welcome, my fair lady," said he. "I see you have brought the new returned exile with you. --Monsieur de Blenau, I am glad to see you at court;--this is a pleasanter place than where we met last."

"I can assure you, sire," replied De Blenau, "that I will never be willingly in circumstances to meet your majesty there again."

"I do not doubt it, I do not doubt it," said the king. "You should thank Heaven that dolivered you from such peril, Sir Count.-Madam," he continued, turning to the queen, "I requested to see you, not only for the pleasure which your presence must always give, but to inform you, that affairs of state will shouly call me to Narbonne, in Languedoc, from whence I shall return with all convenient speed."

"Your majesty soon leaves St. Germain's," replied the queen. "I do not think you love it for a sojourn, as in other days."

"Not so," answered Louis; "so well do llove it, that I had purposed to have worn out the rest of my days here, had not the duties of my station called me hence: but my return will be speedy if God give me life.—What map can say how long he may remain 7 and I feel many a warning that my time will be but short in this world.—Ha? what mean those drops in your eyes ?—I did not know, Anne, that such were your feelings." And he pressed the queen's hand, which he had conloued for retain in his.

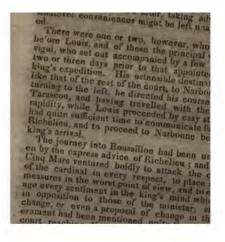

"Oh Louis" replied Anne of Austria, and by that simple exclamation conveyed a more delicate re-whole party should walk forth upon the terms cas the queen's favorite spot, and she easily u tood that it was meant as some atonemer any a former slight. Those, too, who stood i d saw what had taken place, began to perat a new star was dawning in the horizon, read their eyes to watch its progress and couluence.

The king and queen were followed by the gr part of the court : and during the walk L stinned to musifiest that kindness towards e, which, had it been earlier shown, might h en him a hife of happiness. Let me beg y ham," said he, as at length they turned to en palace, " not only to be careful of our el t, for that I am sure you will be, but also to fol of their mother, for my sake."

irolled rapidly down her cheeks, taking fre il power of utterance, and quitting the kin pressing his land to her lips, she retired we apartments, to indulge in solitude the general difficulty of locometion in those by the failing health of the king. It was as in the present time, when monarchs am travel with equal facility all over the glo a king gets into his travelling chaise with to do than a private man, and is carried al a level road without let or hinderance jol ling, to whatsoever place his fancy ma him. The journey of a sovereign was the midable an undertaking as the passage of desert to a modern traveller, and require much provision and circumspection.

One great object of Richelieu's policy to diminish the feudal influence of the no by forcing them to reside with the court, through their constant communication vassels. In pursuit of this, he had drawn t part of the nobles to Paris; and now th sence and declining favor with the king the charm which seemed to hold them in tal, they congregated at St. Germain's lil of bees. that, having lost their hive, flew powers; and in the opinion of all, a few we likely to terminate both his ministry and . tence, even if the eager hand of his ener not hurry him onward to more rapid dest But the fiery spirit of Cinq Mars brooked n the lazy course of natural decay was too his impatience; and though De Thou, who panied his friend to Narbonne, reiterates ears the maxims of caution and wisdom, other hand Fontrailles, fearful lest he sho the merit and consequent influence he sho quire by the removal of Richelieu, never co urgo the favorite to hurry on the complitheir design.

RICHELIE C.

170

In the meantime, every thing seemed fi to the conspirators ; and Cing Mars felt co that the secret inclination of Louis would all his views ; but nevertheless, he wished f more public and determinate expression king's opinion, before he asked his consent measures which had been concerted. arrival of the court at Narbonne, howev monarch's conduct in respect to Richelieu of so decisive a character, that no farther d peared necessary. Within a few miles place where the cardinal lay ill, the king entirely to have forgotten that such a man or only to remember him with hatred. if it was ever mentioned, instantly called in is's countenance an expression of uneasing disapprobation; and by no chance was th ever heard to pronounce it himself. By a circumstances, Cinq Mars was determined municate to Louis, as soon as possible, the s which had been formed for freeing the from the voke of Richelieu. He suffered, he several days to elapse in waiting for a fe opportunity, and at length, as often happen ing impatient of delay, took perhaps the auspicious moment that could have bee

It was on a morning wrong with Louis.

RIC

Notwithstanding his to his accustomed an rode forth to hunt whe bodily exercise. On th ing consciousness of h rendered him doubly which Cinq Mars und the subject of the dism sand trivial accidents h ill-humor to the highes en with him in the cha try for hours without pursuit; and when at boar, and had brought after killing two of th plunged into the deepe was returning home fro when Cinq Mars, tur. towers of Tarascon, rising above the trees them with his hunting the cardinal !!!

"Well, sir," exclaim at my thing on which t you wish us to go and s be glad of the xisit. La in his horse, as if with towards Tarascom.

"Far he it from me t do," replied Cinq Mars the king's answer proce tation. " It was the sig chiteau that called the truth, I had almost forg "Forgotten him, Cin "I think he has done of membered."

"He has indeed, sir his memory will long the heart of every true Frenchman. But there he lies, I trust, like the Tarasque, hideous but harmless, for the present."

"What do you mean by the Tarasque I" demanded Louis ; "1 never heard of it."

"It is merely a whimsical stone dragon, sire," replied Cinq Mars, "that lies carved in the church of St. Marthe, at Tarascon on the Rhone—a thing of no more real use than the Cardinal de Richelieu."

"Of no use, sir !" exclaimed the king, his cye flashing fire. "Do yon think that we would repose such trust, and confide our kingdom's weal to one who is of no use ? Silence, sir !" he continued, seeing Cinq Mars about to reply : "No more of this subject—we have heard toe much of it."

I Cinq Mars was too wise to add another word, and the king rode on to Narbonne, maintaining a sullen silence towards all around him.

Of the conversation which had passed not one word had escaped the cars of Fontrailles; and the moment the correst had dismonted, he followed the master of the horse towards a distant part of the grounds which lay behind the château. Cinq Mars walked on as if he did not see him, and at last finding that he persisted in following, he stopped abrophy, exclaiming, "Well, Fontrailles ; well ! what now ? What would you say ? I can goess it all, so spare yourself the trouble."

"You mistake me, Cinq Mars, replied Fontrajlles, "if you think I would blame you. You did your best, though the time was not the best chosen; but all I wish to press upon you is, not to let this dispirit you. Let the subject die away for the present, and seem forgotten till the king is in a better mood. Every hour of his neglect is death to Richelice; and besides, the king's consent is not about the necessary to us."

"To me, absolutely necessary," replied Cinq Mars, "for I stir not one step without it." "Nay, the king's private consent to you is of course necessary," answered Fontrailles; " but you surely do not think of informing him of the treaty with Spain. After the affair is finished, and Richelieu's power at an end, Louis will see the necessity of it; but such, you must know, is his hatred towards Spain, that he would consider the very proposal as little better than high treason."

"I am not yet determined in that respect," answered Cinq Mars; "my conduct will of course be decided by how I find the king inclined. I like no concealments, where they can be avoided. But in the first place, Villa Grande must carry the treaty to-"

Cinq Mars paused; for, as he spoke, Chavigni turned sharp round from an alley close by, and passed on. The statesman bowed, en passant, to the master of the horse, who but slightly returned his salutation, while, on the other hand, Fontrailles doffed his hat and inclined his head with a hypocritical smile, in which habitual servility was strongly blended with triumphant malice.

Chavigni spoke not, but there were two or three words caught his ear as he passed, which at once turned his suspicions into the right channel, and stimulated him to know more. We have already said that it was a maxim with the statesman, that in politics nothing is mean ; and he would have felt not the slightest hesitation in listening to the conversation of Cinq Mars, could he have done so without being observed. To effect this, it was necessary to take a large round in order to approach the alley in which the two conspirators walked without drawing their attention to himself ; but as he turned to do so, he observed the master of the horse separate from his companion and come towards the spot where he stood, and not wishing to put Cinq Mars on his guard, by showing that he was watched, he turned away and directed his stage towards the château.

"Must carry the treaty-" thought Charing have heard that name, I should then have had the clew in my hands. However, Monsieur de Cinq Mars, you shall be well looked to, at least--take care that you trip not--for if you do, you fall." Thus thinking, he passed on to the stables, where his horses stood, intending, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, and the failing light, to ride over to Tarascon and communicate with Richelien, even should he be obliged to become a borrower of the night for a dark hour or twain. His grooms, however, taking, advantage of his absence, had dispersed themselves in various directions in search of amusement to pass the hours in the dull town of Narbonne; and consequently Chavigni could find no one to saddle his horses for the proposed journey.

Irritated at this impediment, he was about to quit the stable in search of some of the truant grooms, when he again perceived Cinq Mars approaching, accompanied by the Italian Villa Grande. They were in earnest conversation, and Chavigni, knowing that Cinq Mars had horses lodged next to his own, drew back, and searching for a crevice inthe wooden partition, which was as old and decayed as he could desire, he applied himself to listen to all that passed as soon as the master of the horseand his companion entered the adjoining stable. The first words he heard were from the Italiana "You know, monsiegneur," said he, " that the utmost a man can do, is to die in defence of hischarge ; and that will I do, sooner than yield to any man that which you intrust to my hands."

"Well, well," replied Cinq Mars, "there is no need of so many professions, good sir. To-morrow morning then, at day-break, yoo set out. That is the horse-mind you use him well, but spare not his speed. Salute the noble duke on my part with all kindness and love. At nine you come for the freaty: but mark that you keep yout time, for at ten I must be with the king."

"Bat Monseigneur, monseigneur!" cried Villa

RICHELIEV.

Grando, as Cinq Mars turned to leave him ; "perhaps your lackeys will not let me have the horse." "Well then, when you come to night," replied

"Well then, when you come to night," replied the grand ecuyer, "you shall have an order for him."

"Now then, your secret is in my power," thought Chavigni, as Cinq Mars and his companion left the spot. "Monsieur de Villa Grande, I will instantly make out an order for your arrest to-morrow morning, and save you the trouble of your journey. Salate the noble duke !" he continued, meditating on the words of Cinq Mars-" What duke ?--It must be Gaston of Orleans-But he is a royal duke-But we shall sec." And as he walked on towards the château he bent his eyes upon the ground, revolving in his mind the various plans which suggested themselves for withdrawing his patron and himself from the brink of that political precipice on which they stood

His thoughts, however, which for a moment wandered to every different circumstance of his situation, seeking among the many dangers that surrounded some favorable point on which to found a hope, were all suddenly recalled to one object, by the approach of Cardinal Maxarin, who by his hurried step and anxious countenance appeared to be troubled by some unforeseen event.

Notwithstanding their being linked in one cause, notwithstanding their present interests drawing together, notwithstanding all the apparent friendship that existed between them, Chavigni looked upon the cardinal as one who with less zeal had rivalled him in the favor of Richelieu, and who with less talent had incinuated himself as much into the affairs of government; and Mazarin, although obliged to coalesce with Richelieu's favorite, looked forward to the day when the struggle for pre-eminence between them would come to a climax, and one would rise upon the rain of the other : and he are clearly that when that day did arrive, all his solve would hardly qualify him to compete with the b mind and vigarous thiests of Chicyles, unless as could in the first instance grains if acquire for himself such a superiority of interest, is to emble, him to command rather than contend for the highest station.

176

RICHER RU.

The natural effect of these conflicting interests was a feeling of jealous suspicion in the mind of each, which in Mazarin only appeared by the care he took to strengthen his influence wherever it was most opposite to that of Chavigni ; while at the same time, he showed his fellow-statesman an outward respect and deference almost amounting to servillay. But on the other part, Chavigni's hasty disposition made his dislike more apparent, though he took no means of injuring his rival.

As they approached each other, the cardinal made a sign to the page who attended him to remain behind, and folding the train of his robe over him arm, he advanced quickly to Chavigai, embracing him with the greatest memblance of attachment. "My excellent friend," he explained; "I have sought you every what? I have you to fly instantly to Tarascon, or all our hopes are ruined."

"In truth," replied Chavigal, not allowing Mazarin to explain the motives of his request; "your eminence requires what I can hardly comply with; as I have but now got bdsiness on my hands which needs some time to manage. But may I crave the object which would be gained by my going to Tarascon ? I should think that he who could stay two hostile armies on the point of battle, was fully sufficient to any stroke of policy."

There was a sarcastic smile on the lip of Chavigni, as he alluded to the pesce which Mazaria had procured at Gazal, at the moment when the French and Spanish armies were about to engage : but the cardinal would see only the complument. "You are too kind," replied he ; "but in this instance, you only can succeed ; you only, I feel asartedand that not without the exertion of all your info

RIOMELIEU.

ende-can prevent the cardinal prime minister from sending his resignation to the king."

"His resignation !" exclaimed Chavigni, starting back with unfeigned astonishment. "In the name of Heaven, what do you mean ?"

"1 mean this, Chavigni," replied Mazarin, " that unless you reach Tarascon before daylight tomorrow morning, and use very argument in your power to produce, the courier, who bears the official resignation of his Eminence of Richelieu, will have set out for this place. I saw the paper signed to-day, with my own eyes, before I came away ; and all that my utmost entreaties could gain was, that it should be delayed till to-morrow morning, in hopes of your arrival before that time. His eminence feels convinced that the king's favor and his own power are lost forever ; and in truth I begin to think so too."

"Madness and folly !" exclaimed Chavigni, striking his hand against his forehead with vexation. "Madness and folly !-Räscal, saddle me a horse," he continued to a groom, who now loitered into the court with that sort of slow indifferent air which would put an angel in a passion. "Where, in the name of all the devils, have you been lingering 7 Pardon me, your eminence-but I am vexed. I did not think his great mind was so overthrown.-Saddle me a horse, I say. Slave, must you stand eaves-dropping I Beiter you had heen born deaf than overhear my conversation. There are such things as oubliettes to cure listeners. Saddle me a horse, I eav."

"Will you not take some of my servants with you " said Matarin; "they are all in readiness." "No, no," replied Chavigni, "I go alone. Do not let it get abroad that I am gone. I will be back betimes to morrow."

"You had better take one servant, at least," and the cardinal. "The roads are not safe. It is domgerous."

" Dangerous !" exclaimed Chavigni-

RICHELIER

thinks of danger when his all is at stake ? Yeng, emission has a great regard for human lives, for know-for mine more expective. The depend upon it, I shall come house safe to morrow, though I, 4 go alone to night. Now, sir," he continued to the groom, who led forth a strong black hunter for his service, "girt up the saddle a little tighter: unbuckle that cross from his poirtal; I am meither go a ing on a pilgrimage nor a procession."

And now, walking twice round the horse to see, that all the caparisons were in right order, be.t. sprang into the saddle, and dashing his rowals inte. the huntr's finak, galleged out of the court-yard, bowing with a smile as he passed by Mazarin, who started back a step, as the horse's feet, in the rapidity of its course, struck fire with the stones of the pavement.

CHAPTER XIV.

Which shows how a king made reparation, and what came of it.

WHILE, as we have seen, Chavigni galloped off towards Tarascon, forgetting in the agitation produced by the tidings of Mazznin, to take those measures which he had proposed in regard to Villa Grande, Cinq Mars returned directly towards the palace, or rather the house which had been converted into a palace for the king's use. It was one of those old buildings which at that time were common in France, and which even now are often to be met with in cities where the remains of ancient splendor, left alone to the less destructive power of time, have not been demolished by the violence of turbulent times, or the still more invetores equilibrium.

RIONELLEU

of modern improvement. The whole front, with the two octagonal towers at the sides, and the long corridors on the right and left hand of the court, were ornamented with a multitude of beautiful arabesques and bas reliefs. These last, the bas reliefs, entirely covered the principal facade of the building, and offered a number of pictures in stone, representing in some parts battles and triumphs, and in others displaying the humbler and more peaceful subjects of pastoral life and religious ceremonies. Among the rest was one medallion which caught the attention of Cinq Mars ; and as the failing light prevented him from seeing it where he stood, he approached to observe it. The chisel of the sculptor usurping the place of the pencil, had there portrayed a landscape with a flock of sheep pasturing quietly by the side of a brook, while a shepherd appeared sleeping under a hill, down which a wolf was seen stealing upon the flock. Underneath was written in old gothic characters, Eveillez vous, le loup s'approche.

Cinq Mars smiled as he read it, applying the warning to himselt. "Let him come," said he, thinking of Richelieu; "he will be caught himsell." So saying, he turned, and entering the palace, retired to his own apartments. He had not remained there long, however, before he was once more joined by Fontrailles. "Follow me quick, Cinq Mars," cried the conspirator; the king asks for you. Now is the moment to speak to him. He thinks that his peevishness hurt you this morning, and he is willing to make atonement."

It may be well supposed that Cinq. Mars lost no time in following his companion up the great staircase to the king's apartments. It was, indeed, as Fontrailles had said. Since his return, Louis had enjoyed an hour of repose, which cleared from his mind the irratability induced by fatigue, and make him reproach himself for the unkindness. We have shown to one so devotedly attached to him set master of the horse. The reprembrance of it pressed him, and he sent for his favorite, not indeed to apologize, but to wipe away the impression that his irratability had caused, by more than usual kindness and familiarity. The two conspirators found Louis seated in a cabinet, which, being placed in one of the towers partook of its octangular form. The walls were wainscotted with dark carved oak, and even the plafond was all of the same gloomy-coloured material, except a massy gilt cornice and projecting rose in the centre, from which hung a single silver lamp, the rays of which, falling on the figure of the king beneath, gave an additional paleness to his worn but fine countenance, and slightly touching upon his plain black velvet suit, shone full on the richly illuminated book in which he had been reading.

Louis raised his eyes as Fontrailles entered, and then turning them full on the noble countenance of Cinq Mars who followed, a pleased smile beamed for a moment on his lip, and he exclaimed, " Well, Cinq Mars, art thou Nimrod enough to hunt again to-morrow after our misfortur es of to-day ? Come in, Monsieur de Fontrailles," he continued, seeing that Fontrailles remained near the door, hesitating whether he should retire or not, now that he had done the king's bidding in summoning the grand ecuyer. "Come in, I pray-Sit you down, gentleraen-it is the king's request; you, Cinq Mars, here-Monsieur de Fontrailles, there is a seat. Now," he continued, glancing his eye round as the light of the lamp gleamed faintly on their several countenances-" now we look like some secret triumvirate met to decide the fate of nations."

"And that might be too," replied Cinq Mars : "your majesty to command and we to execute."

The king took no notice, but went on with what he had himself been saying : "There is Cinq Mars looks like a noble prince, and Fontrailles like a wily minister, and I--I believe," he continued laughing, "I have left myself no place but that of secretary."

RICHELIED.

"Alas " said Cinq Mars with a deep sigh, " alas ! that there should be any man in your majesty's dominions more a king than yourself."

Fontrailles and the king both started; and the conspirator internally pronounced "all is lost," while Cinq Mars himself, who had spoken without thought, only felt the imprudence of his speech when it was beyond recall.

"Cinq Mars / Cinq Mars i" cried Louis, "that is n daring speech --but I know it proceeded from your love for me, and therefore I pardon it. But I will tell you that no man is more a king in France than I am."

"I crave your majesty's gracious pardoh," replied the master of the horse. "If I have offended your majesty, it was from love for you alone that I spoke. My words were bolder than my thoughts, and I only meant to say that I could wish to see my monarch show himself that great king which he naturally is. I would fain see the staff of command withdrawn from one who abuses it."

"Cinq Mars," answered the king, "that staff is in my own hand. It was but lent, my friend ; and it is now resumed."

The master of the horse pansed for a moment, not exactly certain how far he could rely upon the king's good humor, which he had already tried so incautiously, and turned his eyes towards Fontmilles, as if for counsel.

"Speak, Cinq Mars," said Louis, seeing his hesitation, "speak boldly, and fear not; for 1 fully believe that all your wishes are for my service, and 1 would fain hear the voice of these that regard me with affection, rather than for their own interest; and one of these do 1 hold you to be."

"Your majesty does me justice," replied Cinq Mars. "Let me not offend you then, when I say that the power you lent is scarcely resumed while the title under which it was enjoyed remains. The Cardinal Duke of Richelieu, my liego, is still prime minister to France. He has still all the per-(though not exercised), the revenues, the offices. Our soldiers are fighting at his command, our provinces are governed by his creatures, our high posts are filled by his friends. He has an army for his servants, and more than the riches of a prince. Why not-oh, why not, sire break the enchanter's wand that gave him so much sway, and sweep away the hordes that prey upon the state, like swarms of flies upon a slain deer ? Why not direct the operations of your troops yourself, and let the armies of France be the armies of the king, and not of Richelieu ? Why not chase from your councils a man who has so often abused the generous confidence of his sovereign, and make him disgorge the ill-gotten wealth which he has wrong from the hearts of your people ?"

RICHELIEV.

As he spoke, Cinq Mars grew warm with his subject ; his eye sparkled, his arm was extended with that wild and graceful energy for which he was conspicoous; his words flowed uninterrupted, with all the eloquence of entrusiasm, and his fine and princely features acquired a new and striking expression, while animated in the cause of his country's liberty, he pleaded against the tyrant who had oppressed both king and people. Louis gazed on him at first as on one inspired; but as a host of consequences crowded on his mind, threatening him with a thousnad vague and unsubstantial dangers, he placed his hands before his cyes, and remained for some moments in deep thought.

"My friend," said he at length, "what is it you would have me do? This man-this bad man if you will-but still this great man-is like an oak whose roots are deep in the earth; you may hew them asunder one by one, but it requires a giant's, strength to pluck the tree up at once. Richelieu's power may be taken from him gradually; but to attempt what you propose, would instantly cause a rebellion among my subjects. He has so many who depend ppon him; he has so many that are allied to him_?

" What ?" exclaimed Cinq mars, " shall it be said that King Louis was afraid to dismiss his own minister 1"

"Not afraid for myself, sir," replied the king, somewhat sharply ; " but afraid of bringing the miseries of civil war upon my people."

Perceiving that Cinq Mars was urging the king too impetuously, Fontroilles, who had hitherto remained silent, now joined in the conversation in a soft insinuating tone, calculating to remove any newly raised irritation from Louis's mind. " All danger, sire," said he, still laboring to quiet the king's fears without opposing his opinion, " all danger, which might otherwise be imminent, could easily be chviated, by commanding the noble Duke of Bouillon-"

At the name of the Duke of Bauillon, Louis made an impatient mot-on with his band. "He is Spanish at his heart," said he ; " that Duke of Bouillon is Spanish, rank Spanish. But what of him, Monsieur Fontrailles ?"

"Believe me, my liege," replied Fontrailles, the Duke of Bouillon, whom I know well, is not so much a friend to Spain as he is an enemy to Richelieu. Remember, sire, how he is linked with the Prince of Orange, the sworn adversary of Spain."

Louis shook his head doubtingly. "But what of him, Fontrailles ? Come to the point." "Only this, sire," said Fontrailles. " The dake commands an army in Italy devoted to your majesty's service ; but permit me or Cing Mars to give him private orders in your name to march them into France, and who shall dare to murmur at your toyal will ?"

"Why, that might be done, it is true," answered Louis ; "but I am afraid, mon grand," he continued, applying to Cinq Mars the term by which he distinguished him in his kindest and most familiar moments-" I am afraid, mon grand, that those are keen huntsman and a good soldier, thou woolden make but'a sorry minister." "I minister !" exclaimed the grand ecover and forbid! No, no, my lord! never did such a the cross my imagination. Believe, sire, I had no of personal aggrandizement in the proposal I mitted to your majesty."

"But if you take from Richelieu his office, w do you wish to substitute in his place ?" dema Louis ; "some one must be minister."

"True, my liege; but are there not thous well fitted for the post?" said Cinq Mars—" P ciane as deep, but more humane than Richel Men who can govern, and yet not tyrannize? uudertake to find such a one for your majesty, yet remain myself fully satisfied with being humble friend of my royal master, and the sit well-wisher of my native country. But let m der, in your, name, the Duke of Bouillon to n into France; and then, provided with sufficien ces to disarm this usurping minister, and ove rebellion, your own royal will shall be your guide."

"At present," said Fontrailles, "the king's for his people operates in two opposing direct making him anxious to relieve them from the den under which they groan, yet fearlul of thrc a portion of them into rebellion. But by the ence of the duke's army, the minister might. I moved without endangering the tranquillity of realm."

"True," said Louis; "true. Monsieur de trailles, you say right;" and placing his hand t his eyes, the king thought for a moment, strug inwardly to exert the powers of his mind, and up sufficient resolution to deliver himself fro thraldom in which he had so long been held. dangers, and doubts, and difficulties swam t his mental vision, like motes dancing in the surand never destined in life to overcome his lon couraged inactivity, he strove to cast the resbility from himself. "Well, well, exclair "Cing Mars, you shall decide it; I will be conduct of it all to you. But beware the

"Let it be so, then, my liege," cried kissing the emaciated hand of the feeble cuces be upon your own head." "it shall not be my fault if France and reign are not soon freed from the cloud t long overshadowed them both," "Well, well," and Louis, " we will true for the event. But heware of Boaillon; C he is rank Spanish at his heart. And now men, to bed, for we must rise in time for o Bat, in truth, I fear I shall not hant much he body fails me, Cinq Mars, though I was hing of strength, as thou art." CHAPTER How Chavigni rode fifty a mains to 1 HILE these schemes for

RICHELIEU-

to oppose them; but that the cardinal we a his high office he had never suppected if at, and therefore the tidings brought by A me apon him like a thunder-stroke, takin all faculty of thought, but on that one was well aware too, that it was no easy a Richelien from his purpose; and as he r mind was solely occupied by a thousand bus and ill-digested plans, for preventing tion of what the cardinal designed.

Daylight set in the west, and night fell er the earth without exciting a thought in n of Chavigni; for the irritation of his fo k away all sensation of bodily fatigue, and attention to external objects, till at leng ing pace of his horse showed him that at must have rest; and accordingly he pau hort space at a little village, a few league rascon, in order to refresh his beast. re the agitation of his mind prevented his eking any repose himself, and he continued up and down before the little auberge, he that he was thus compelled to remain. t was considerably past midnight when C ived at the residence of the minister. the court-yard, all was in darkness, ere, in one spot, a light was seen burning amber of the invalid, and throwing dark e window the bent shadow of a sleeping nt. The statesman fastened his horse to on n hooks in the cour-yard, and advanced, to make himself heard by some one with found the grooms, grown negligent during d's sickness, had left the door unfastene shing it with his hand, it readily gave way like his fate," thought Chavigni ; " while and sleeping, the gate is left open, and a v enter."

he grand staircase. Tighted by a lamp

RIOHELIEU

room where the cardinal lay.

been left to die out as it might, and approached the

The door of the antechamber opened stiffly, but still the drowsy attendant did not awake ; and Chavigni passed on into the bed-chamber of the cardi nal, without any one being aware of his presence. "Were this but known," thought the statesman, " how many assassios' hands would now be armed for this one man's destruction !"

It was Richelieu alone, who, lying in feverish rest-

lessness, caught the sound of approaching steps ; and there was a sort of intensity in the glance which the fixed on the door communicating with the ante room, which seemed to say that his judgment of the visiter's purpose was not very favorable. However that might be, whether from the reckleseness of illness, or from the torpor of one who regards the future as a blank, he took no farther notice of the sound he heard, than by fixing his eyes sternly on the door. But the next moment, as the light fell strongly on the face of his friend, the countenance of Richelien brightened with a smile; and perceiving that Chavigni, who did not see he was awake, approached silently towards the attendant to rouse him, the cardinal pronounced his name in an under tone, and beckoned him towards his bedside. " It is grateful," said Richeliev, as the statesman drew near, " to find that even declining fortunes cannot alienate some hearls. You have seen Mar-Chavigni was about to answer, but the sound of the cardinal's voice had awakened the attendant, who was now gazing about in no small alarm, on perceiving a stranger standing by the minister's bedside. Richelien, however, without showing any anger at his negligence, calmin commanded him to eave thom ; and as soon as they were alone, Chagriprozeeded, "I have seen Cardinal Manana, y tord, and from him I have learned a viege by ws which grieves me most deepig. I connot be te that ittness can have so far depressed the sour-its of your eminence, as to make you exterthin they throught of casting from you all these high homening which you have so long enjoyed, and of lowying France, in a moment of her greatest peril, to her governed by the hands of the weak and the designing."

MICHETIEU.

"It is not illness, Chavigni," replied the cardinal, with a melancholy shake of the head. "No! but my day is over. The power has passed from any; hands, and it only remains for me to yield the name of it, before that tee is taken from me by my ease mice."

"Pardon me, your emissiones," wid Chavigni: "bat indeed the power is not gone from you. Under whose orders are our armies fighting ? Under whose command is every city and fortress in Frances?. Is it the character of a brave man, to yield all without a struggle ?--to cast away the swerij he has so long wielded, and to give tranself bound into the hands of his adverments?? "Mark me, Charign?" said Richelice, reining.

"Mark my, Charlent," esis Richelies, raising himself upon his elbow, "Losis is now within the distance of a few leagues. He knows that I am ill --perhaps that I am dying; and yet, by no sign of common courtesy does he show that he remembers me. Bat that was not the beginning. I saw that my power was gone, when he dared, in the face of all the council, to annul the sentence I passed on that arrogant, stiff-necked Count De Blenau, who had the hardihood to defy the utmost extent of my power." And the minister's eyes flashe! with the memory of his anger.

"Had your emineace followed my advice," replied Chavigni, "that business would nover have occurred. There is that sort of gallant magnanimity about Claude de Blenau which carries all before. it; and I felt assured that neither fear nor interest would ever induce him to disclose any thing intrased to his honor. Depend upon it, monseigneur, that it is better not to meddle withhuch men, when we can avoid it."

Transfer Loads - and -

......

۰.

ż

RECHELIEU

"Well, well, sir," exclaimed the cardinal, impatienfly, " without doubt you were quite right and I was quite wrong. But do not teach me to believe that you too. Chavigni lose your respect for my person when my power is failing."

"Pardon me, your eminence," replied Chavigni, in a tone of deep feeling, "you wrong me much. Your eminence has been more than a father to me. During the continuance of your power you have always exerted it in my favor; and whether it remains with you or not, my respect and my affection will never fail to follow you in every situation Believe me, monseigneur, that it is that respect and affection which brings me here even now, to petition that you will waive your intention of-"

" Chavigni, it is useless, ' interposed the cardinal. "I have only the choice left, to yield it of my own free will, or to have it wrenched from my unwilling hand Judge which is the wisest-judge which is the best."

"Were that certainly the case," said Chavigni, thoughtfully.

"It is certainly the case," replied the minister. " there are many, many combined against me :singly, they are but reeds, and one by one I would break them like reeds; but united together, and with the king at their head,"-and he shook his head despairingly .- " they are far too strong either for you or me !??

"But could no means be found to separate them ? Bethink you, monseigneur,-avarice, revenge, ambition, might sow the seeds of discord among them, and give them like sheep into our hands."

" It is too late, my friend !" replied the cardinal : "it is too late! Had I foreseen it. I might have prevented their combining. 1 might have crushed some, and bribed others; destroyed the powerful, and overawed the timid. But it is now too bee!

"But whom does your eminence think parties-Jarly implicated ?" demanded Chavigni. "Oh, there are many-many-many " reside Orleans, and witty Marsillao, and cool, mora De Thou, who has so often dared to pry into a tions and condemn them; then there is, about aly Fostrailles, and Cinq Mars, whom I--"

"" Hs!" exclaimed Chavigni, as the cardinal's ' recalled to his mind the conversation between Mars and Fontrailles—" I had forgot—like an I had forgot!" and he struck his clenched ham lently against his brow, as if he sought to p his own folly. "But it is not yet too late," h ed, "it is not yet too late."

"Forgot what, Chavigni?' demanded the nal, seeing with astonishment the emotion v was called up in his friend by the remembran so great an oversight. "Forgot what? Toc for what? What is it moves you so deeply?"

"Pandon me, your eminence," replied Cha "I have not time to explain; only I have to an favers. The first is, that you will let me tu stout horse from your stables; mine will go n ther. The next," he added, in a tone of gr composure, but still one of earnest entreatvfou have," said Richelieu. " Out of regard for and solely because you ask it, I will suspend resolution till your return."

RIGHELLEU.

191

Well, then, God protect your eminence till we heet again !" exclaimed the statesman. "I go up-on your service : and if I do not succeed, I care not how soon my head may be brought to the block, as a just punishment for my mad forgetfulness." Thus saying, he quitted the moun, and descending to the stables, called up the grooms, whose sleepy movements ill accorded with the rapid emotions of his bosom. Now the stirrups were not long enough, then the girths had to be buckled tighter. then the bit was mislaid, and then the crupper could not be found. At length, however, the horse was fully preparod, and calling for a cup of wine, Chavigni drained it to the bottom, and galloping out of the court, was soon once more on the road to Narbonne. But it was in vain that he used whip and spur to arrive at that town before the hour appointed for the Italian's departure. Ere he had measured half the way, the day rose bright over the hills before him, and clenching his hands he exclaimed in the bitterness of disappointment, "Too late ! I am too late !" Still, however, he went on at full speed, hoping that by sending out couriers in every different direction. he might yet overtake the messenger.

Every one who has ridden from Tarascon to Narbonce must remember the picturesque beauties of that part of the country. At the spot where Chavignt had now arrived, high rocks breaking forth from a thick covering of wood skirted his way on each side, and having ascended to the top of the hill, an immense valley lay before him, scattered with forests and broken into a thousand inferior ridges, some of which bore upon their summits the steeple of a village church, some of the runs of those ancient towers which had been success is days gone by to defend the passes from the weat boring Moors of Spain. At his feet thin warms white mist floating in the morning lighth part obscured the road he was going, till, rising out of the trees, it was seen winding along the mountains on the other side. Chavigni paused for a moment to trace its direction; and as he did so his eye fell upon the figure of a single horseman, descending into the valley from the opposite hill.

RICHELLEU.

"Whom have we here "" thought the statesman, not without a faint hope that it might be the person he sought. Spurring on his horse, however, he rode forward to meet him; but on reaching the bottom of the descent, the figure he had seen from above became hidden by the windings of the road among the trees, and Chavigni's heart fluttered lest "the horseman, whoever he was, might have taken the other road which turned through the valley to the left."

At length, however, the sound of a horse's feet was heard approaching quickly towards him, and, certain that he must now pass that way, the statesman drew in his rein, and stood with his eyes intently fixed upon the spotwhere the road verged into the forest. As there was still a considerable descent from the spot where' Chavigni paused to the bottom of the valley, the sound was heard for a long time coming nearer and nearer before any one appeared. At length, however, the horseman came in sight, presenting to the glad eyes of the statesman the identical figure of the italian, Villa Grande, with his long sword, extensive mustachios, and a pair of heavy pistols at his saddle-bow.

Chavigni doubted not that to possess himself of the papers which the Italian carried, would require a desperate struggle, but without a moment's hesitation he drew his sword, and galloped on to attack him. No sooner had Villa Grande perceived a stranger on the road before him, than he reined in his horse; but now, as Chavigni rode on fall speed towards him with a menacing attitude and drawn sword, the Italian, in his terror, conceived at once that if was a robber, and throwing himself to the that if was a robber, and throwing himself to the

'ing, "I will give it you all-every'ducat, only spare 'my life !"

"Rise, rise f cowardly villain!" cried Chavigni, catching the bridle of the Italian's horse, which was starting away with a wild toss of the head, as the statesman rode up; "rise, Sir Poltroon! do you not know me ?"

"Know you ! know you !" exclaimed Villa Grande gazing wildly at Chavigni. "Oh, monseigneur, is it you ? How you frightened me !" But Villa Grande who had trembled sufficiently when he thought it was a robber, trembled ten times more than ever as he recognised the statesman; and he could scarcely find strength in his knees to raise himself from the ground.

"Rise, sir!" exclaimed Chavigni, impatiently; " and instantly give me the treaty."

"Treaty " cried Villa Grande, still trembling, but endeavoring to put on a look of astonishment.--" What treaty does monseigneur mean ? I know of no treaty."

" Lying slave !" exclaimed Chavigni, striking him with the flat side of his sword; "if you do not produce it within ten seconds of time, by heaven I will cut it out of your base cowardly heart!"

"But if I do-" said the Italian, seeing there was no escape left.

" Come, sir," cried the statesman; " no buts for me. If you stand shuffling one minute more. I will run my sword through you, and search for it on your carcas myself."

"Well, well ! monseigneur, I see you know it all, and therefore it will be no stain on my honor if I give it to you."

"Honor !" cried Chavigni, with a scoff. "Come, sir, the treaty."

Villa Grande approached his horse, and traising the flap of the saddle, with shaking hands, drew forth, from a pocket concealed in the padding, a large paper scaled in an envelope. Chavigat except it eagerly from his grasp, and running his eye of Statesmin, there is not statesmined begins exceeding the part while the statesmined begins exceeding the part of the model of the part of the part is check. "God of heaven! what is this ?" said to Though I doubt, not, my noble riend, that after all which has so lately passed, you would put your forces in motion at my sin ple desire, the king's command is yet higher authority; and that I now send you, to march with all speed to the frontier, embarking five thousand foot at Porto Longone, to laud at Marselles. All this in case the friends and adherents of Richeliev, should attempt to make head against the royal authority.'---"All'is tost!" muttered Chavigni. "But let us see the whole, at least, to provide for our own safe-by \mathcal{Y} and he again turned to the paper, which proceeded-1 send you the treaty with Spain for your signature, which is especially necessary to the artiele relative to your principality of Sedan. The troops of his Ca holic majesty are on the frontier, teady to march at our command; but I have been obliged to conceal from the king our Spanish connexion, as his hatred to that country is as great as

" I have you ! I have you ! Monsieur Cinq Mars," ever."

exclaimed Chavigni, clasping his hands with joy-"This treaty is your death-warrant, or I know not King Louis-Italian ecoundrel 1" he continued, luraing to look for Villa Grande-"Ha! the slave has escaped-that must not be; he were the best witness in the world against them ;" and springing from his horse, he tied him to a tree together with that

While Chavigni had been reading, with all his attention fixed upon the paper, and all his passion exof the Italian. cited by its contents, Villa Grande, watching his moment, had crept gradually to the edge of the wood, and darted into a narrow path, half covered with branches. But though the way he had taken was thus, in a degree concested; it did not escap ille quick eye of the statesmin; and as the motion of the Italian, till he had got into the wood, been necessarily cautions, in order not to us attention ; Chavigni, following as fast an

soon caught the sound of his retreating footsteps, reverberated from the rocks around. As he advanced, he called houldy to the Italiam to stop, and that he should have a free pardon; but Villa Grande, trusting to the distance that was still between them, and hoping, if he could elude immediate pursuit, to be able to escape into Spain, continued running on while Chavigni as perseveringly followed, threatening and promising by turns, but alike without any effect.

At length the strength of the Italian, already diminished by fear, began to fail entirely; and Chavigni found that the distance between them was rapidly lessening, when in 'n moment the sound of footsteps, which had hitherto guided him, ceased entirely—a cry of agony reached his ear; and running still more quickly forward, he, too, had nearly been precipitated over the edge of a steep erag. which, in the hurry of his flight, the unhappy Italian had not noticed. The statesman's first impulse was to start back, for he was on the very brink of the precipice before he was on the very brink of the precipice before he was aware; but soon recovering himself, he approached the edge, and looking over, beheld the mangled form of Villa Grande Jying on some rough stony ground at the bottom of the rock. "God of Heaveen!" cried Chavigni, " what a fall !

The poor wretch must surely be dead. However, he must not lie there, for the wolves will soon be at him j? and looking round, he sought for some way to descend the rock. It was a considerable time before he could accomplish his object, but at length he succeeded, and on arriving at the spot where Villa Grande lay he found that the Italian, in his flight had taken a diagonal path through the forest, which cut off a large bend in the main road, and joined it again by a zigzag path down the rock at some distance. Thus the spot where Villa Grande was then lying, was then about half a mile from the place at which he had first been encountered by Chavigal. A the light road was followed; but by the path through the wood the distance could not be more than a fi hundred yards. Chavigni's first care was to examine the body of the Italian, who was so entirely deprived of sense, that at first the statesman believed him to be dead: but in a moment or two some signs appeared which led him to conclude that life was not completely extinct; and taking him in his arms he carried him to the spot where the horses stood. Here he placed him on the stout black hunter which Cinq Mars had lent, and led him slowly to a small town about a mile farther on the road.

TICHELIEU.

It has been already stated, that hardly was there a village so small in the whole extent of France as not to be furnished with one or more of those agents of Richelieu's minute policy, whose principal duty consisted in communicating every thing that passed around them to another class of superior agents, and also to facilitate all the secret operations of government in the sphere ascribed to them. The actual pay received by these men was but small : but the favor shown to them on all occasions, and the facilities afforded to them in their more ordinary employments, put them above competetion with others in the same class, and amply rewarded their private services ; for it must always be remembered that their connexion with the government was held as a profound secret, and consequently they always were seen to exercise some open trade, which, in most cases, prevented their less ostensible employment from being even suspected by their neighbors.

It was to the house of one of these inferior agents that Chavigni led the horse charged with the senseless body of Villa Grande; and having commanded that he should be taken in and placed in hed, he himself aided in endeavoring to recall him to life, partly from the natural humanity of his disposition, partly from these political considerations which were ever puramount in his mind. Villa Grande, if he could be restored, would prove, Clussing kenes, too excellent a witness against the conservations whom he had aerved, to permit of his life below hightly cast away; capacitally as it was evident, the is written expressly to prove that there at many a. She between the Gup and the Lipy a the small chapel of St. Catherine, other of the queen's chapel, attached to the unch of St. Germain de Laye, to which Par op of Beauvais, proceeded with about loor of a private communication with château, on a night in October, one thousand six hundred and forty-two. He was proceeded by two young abbes, carrying lighted tapers, and followed by a group, whose white garments spoke that they came on some occasion of joy. The first of these was Anne of Austria, with her eyes animated, and her countenance glowing with the interest she took in every thing which bore the least appearance of secrecy or romance. Her right arm was passed through that of the Marchioness de Beaumont, who moved on with a calm, rather grave countenance ; while on the queen's left, walked a young lady in the first gay spring of life; ever and anon turning a smiling, playful glance behind to Pauline de Beaumont, who, leaning on the arm of Claudo de Blenau, followed, agitated, blushing, and happy, towards the altar at which they were to be united for ever. Seguin, the queen's physician, and Henri de La Mothe, the count's page were admitted as witnesses to the ceremony; and attendant was stationed at the door, to guard against any troublesome devotee entering the church during the time it was thus occupied.

UHAPTER XVL

~ tž

RICHELIEV.

The idea of marrying Pauline de Beaumont privately with the Count de Blenau, had entirely originated with the queen, whose passion for any thing romantic often threw both hersell and her friends into situations of great danger. In the present instance, she represented to Madame de Beaumont that a thousaud circumstances might occur in these unhappy times, to tear De Blenau again from her he loved; or that the cardinal might postively probibit their marriage, and then, she asked, who would dure to oppose him I whereas their private union would obviate all difficulties, and incur no danger.

Madame de Beaumost made many objections, and ber daughter hestated; but the wishes of the queen overcame all the marchitenes's scruphes; and the entreaties of De Blenau were not test powerful with Pauline.

The appointed night being arrived, and all & arrangements having been made as privately as pes sible, Pauline, as we have said, followed her mother and the queen into the chapel of St. Catherine. But as she did so, there was a sort of despendency fell upon her that she could not account for. As she leaned upon De Blenau, she felt that she was most happy in being united to him. She was agitated, it was true, but still it was natural that she should be so, she thought. All her duties, all her ideas, were, by one single word, about to suffer an, entire change, yet that did not take from her happiness. But still there was an undefined fear, a sort of melancholy presentiment, which weighed upon her spirits, she knew not why. She asked herself, was De Blenau less kind ? Oh, no ! And as the thought passed through her mind, she raised her eyes for a moment from the ground, on which they had been bent, and turned them on her lover. In so doing, they met the full, soft, affectionate gaze, with which De Blenau was at that moment regarding her, and a deep blush rose in her cheek, but soon faded away, and left her again pale and thoughtful. She had not, however, much time to analyze her feolings ; for, by this time, the bishop had reached the altar, and waited their approach.

Potier, Bishop of Beauvais, had little of that gentleness of disposition, or suavity of manner, calculated to reassure Pauline. He had undertaken the office which he came there to fulfil, merely at the desire of the queen, and that not without making considerable opposition. But, though Potier was obstinate, Anne of Austria was still more so. She had resolved that the ceremony should be performed, and that he should perform it, and she carried her point; but yet he made his dislike to the task very apparent, and regarded the innocent Pauline with no friendly looks.

"Come, mademoiselle," said he, as Pauline seemed to linger for a moment, "you and Monsicur le Compte will have enough of each other's society after my office is over. Let us proceed with the ceremony."

MOHELIEU.

The group arranged themseves round the altar, and the bishop opening the book began to read, The promise, which was to bind her to De Blenau for ever, trembled on Pauline's lips, when a confused noise at the private door leading to the palace caught her ear, and she paused.

Do Blenau, who had not heard it, turned towards her in surprise; but immediately the voice of the attendant, who had been stationed there as portgreve, was heard exclaiming to some one, who apparently endeavored to make his way into the church, "Stand back, I say. You do not enter here! What is your authority 1".

"My authority," replied another voice, " is a warrant of connell. Oppose it if you date. Strike him down, if he does not let you pass." And immediately the door bursting open, an officer of the cardinal's guard, with a file of soldiers, entered the church.

"Gand the doors," cried the officer, "and let no one quit the place." And giving his partisan to one of the soldiers, he advanced towards the high Gothic arcs, forming the boundary between the main aisle and the chapel of St. Catherine.

Paulme clung to De Blenau, "Oh, Claude !" cried she, "they are going to tear you from me again. My heart misgave me.--I was sure that something dreadful would interpose between us."

De Blenau whispered a few words of comfort to her, and Potier himself was moved by her agitation. "Do not be afraid, young lady." said he; "we are on sacred ground.—Stop, su," he continued, advancing to the steps of the chapel, which the officer had just reached." what seek you here ? And how do you presume to bring armed men into this church ?"

"I come, sir," answered the officer, "with a warmat from his majesty's council, to arrest Chaude

VOL. 11. 14

Count de Blenau ;" and he made a step towards the chapel.

202

"Hold " exclaimed the bishop, "You arrest him not here. This ground is sanctuary; and I command you, in the name of God and our holy religion, to withdraw your men, and instantly to quit this church." And he waved his hand with an air ef dignified authority.

The officer paused. " But, monseigneur," he replied, "the count is charged with high treason."

"With high treason !" exclaimed the queen. "With high treason !" echoed Fauline, clinging still closer to De Blenau's arm, which she held encirled by both her own.

"He is charged with high treason," repeated the officer : " and I must fulfil my duty."

"Were he charged with all the crimes which disgrace humanity," replied the bishop, "here be is sanctuarized; and I command you, on pain of ercommunication—you, Sir Officer, and your soldiers, to quit the church. I stand not here to see this slater violated, whatever be your authority."

The officer paused a moment, uncertain how to act. "Well, holy father," replied he at length," I obey; but I shall take especial care to guard every door of the church; so that if there be any blame, it does not fall on me." And muttering between his teeth the discontent he did not dare to vent aloud, he slowly withdrew his men.

The eye of Anne of Austria watched them intently till the last soldier had passed through the door which communicated with the palace. Then turning quickly to the count, she exclaimed, "Fly quick, De Blenau, up that staircase cross the jube, through the monks' gallery round the choir. You will find a door on the right that leads into the king's cabinet. Wait there till 1 send-Quick, fly-1 casite-1 command you."

"Oh fly, Claude, fly 1" reiterated Pauline," they will murder you surely this time, if you do not

By," "Pardon me, your majasty-pardon me, dear Pauline," replied De Blenau ; " it cannot be. There is no man in France more innocent, in deed, word, or even thought, of treason against his king and country than I am; and Claude de Blennu flies from no one, so long as his honor and integrity remain by him : when these fail, then he may become a coward. But to these will I now trust, and instantly surrender myself to his majesty's warrant. I did not interfere while monseigneur defended the rights of the sanctuary, for he did but the duties of his high office ; nor indeed was I willing to yield my sword to a servant of Cardinal Richelieu, Take it, Henry," he continued, unbuckling it from his side, and giving it to the page ; "take it, and keep it for your master."

"De Blenau, you are an obstinate man," said the queen. "I will urge nothing ; but look at this pale cheek, and fancy what the feelings of that sweet girl must be." And she pointed to Pauline who stood by with the tears chasing each other down her face.

Notwithstanding the firmness with which he spoke, there had been many a bitter pang struggling in De Blenau's breast, The appeal of the queen, and the sight of Pauline's distress, overcame bis calmness ; and starting forward, he caught her in his armies and pressed an ardent kiss upon her lips. "Dear, dear Pauline," he exclaimed, "all will go well, be assured. My innocence will protect me."

Pauline shook her head mournfully, but her heart was too full to reply.

"Then you will not fly !" demanded the queen, with some degree of impatience.

"He is in the right, madam?' said the biston-"As a good subject, he is bound to obey the target of his country; and in duty to himsell, we can

124

ł

the address, he read......" "To Monationary the Dede Bouillon, commander-in-chief of all the armitted of France, warring in Italy." Ha !" continued the statesman, "this is not the road to Italy. What brings you here !" and he turned towards Villa Grando. But while the statesman's eyes were fix and but while the statesman's eyes were fix towards the wood ; Chavigni, however, perceiving his design, caught one of the pistcle from the se's saddle-bow, and pointing it towards the there, sir," said be. "Now tell me what makes man here, who this packet was instanded for Italy"

"Why, monseigneur-why-why-to tell the trath, there was another little despatch to be delivered on the froatiers of Spain; here it is;" and diving into a deep pocket in his doublet, he produced a packet smaller than the other, and gave it into Chavigni's hand. "And now; monseigneur, I have freely discovered all know," continued Villa Grande, "I hope that you, monseigneur, will promiss me your protections; for if the other party get hold of me, they will murder me to a certainty."

Chavign! made no answer; but without any ceremony broke the seals of the two packets, and passing his horre's brille over his arm while he read them, he opened the treaty, and turned to the list of names by which it was signed. In the mean while, Villa Grande kept his eyes fixed upon him, watching for a favorable moment to escape, if the stateman's attention should be sufficiently engaged to allow him so to do.

"Ah! here I have them fairly written," proceeded Chavigni, speaking to himself. "Philip the most Catholic:-Olivarez!-thenfollow Gaston of Orleans; Cinq Mars, grand ecuyer; Fontrailles;-and a space-for Bouillon of course. Now let us seethe letter to the noble duke;" and he opened the one which he found in the same packet with the treaty. But as he read, his eye fixed with painly Garnestness upon the paper, and the colar best tree

RICHELIKO.

"All is tost!" muttered Chavigni. " But let us see the whole, at lesst, to provide for our own safety y" and he again turned to the paper, which proceeded--1 send you the treaty with Spain for your signature, which is especially necessary to the article relative to your principality of Sedan. The troops of his Ca holic majesty are on the frontier, geady to march at our command; but I have been obliged to conceal from the king our Spanish connexion, as his hatred to that country is as great as ever."

"I have you! I have you! Monsient Cinq Mars," exclaimed Chavigni, clasping his hands with joy. "This treaty is your death-warrant, or I know not King Louis.—Italian scoundre! "he continued,turning to look for Villa Grande..." Ha! the shave has secaped—that must not be; he were the best witness in the world against them;" and springing from his horse, he tied him to a tree together with that of the Italian.

While Chavigni had been reading, with all his attention fixed upon the paper, and all his passion excited by its contents. Villa Grande, watching his moment, had erept gradually to the edge of the wood, and darted into a narrow path, half covered with branches. But though the way he had taken was thus, in a degree concealed; it did not escape the quick eye of the statesman; and as the motion of the Italian, till he had got into the wood, of been necessarily cautions, in order not to with attention; Chavigni, following as fast as view would tear him from her; and tear after tear rolled silestly down her cheeks. The heart of De Blenau also was too full for words, so that silence hung upon the whole party.

At the door which communicated with the palace, stood the cardinal's officer, with too or three of his men; and as she approached, the queen desired him to follow her to the saloon. The officer bowed low, and replied, that he would obey her commands; but immediately advancing to De Blenau, he laid his hand upon the count's arm. " In the king's name, Monsiear le Comte de Blenau," said he, "I arrest you for high treason. Behold my warrant."

Pauline recoiled with a look of fear; and De Blenau calmly put the man's hand from off his sleeve. -- "Pass on, sir." he said. "I am your prisoner." The officer hesitated; "Pass on, sir." repeated the count; "you have my word. I am your prisoner."

The man passed on, but not before he had made a sign to the soldiers who were with him, who suffered the count and Pauline to pass, and then closing in, followed at a few paces distance.

On reaching the saloon, the queen took her seat ; and beckoning to Pauline, who, faint and terrified, was hardly able to support herself, she made her sit down on the footstool at her feet. "Now, Sir Officer," said Anne of Austria, " what news bring you from Narbonne ? How fares his majesty the king !"

"May it please you, madame," he replied, "I come not from Narbonne, as your majesty supposes, but from Tarascon, where the king had just arrived when I departed."

"The king at Tarascon !" exclaimed Anne of Austria". "In the name of Heaven, what does he at Tarascon ?"

"That is beyond my knowledge," answered the officer. "All I can tell your majory is, that for the last week there has been strange fring of couldress from one place to another. Monsieur de Chavigni has almost killed himself with riding between Tarascon and Narbonne. Every thing is altered, evidently, but no one knows how or why; and just as Aleron, Monsieur de Brezès maibre d'hotel, was about to give me the whole history, I received an order to set off for Paris instantly, and when I nrrived there, to take twenty troopers from the caserne, and come on hither on the errand which I have the honor to perform."

206

,

RICHELIE

"But did you hear nothing ?" demanded the queen, earnestly. "Did this Aleron tell you nothing ?"

"Nothing, madame," replied the officer. "He had just made me promise inviolable secrecy, and we were interrupted before he began his tale ; or I would have told your majesty with pleasure."

"But from report ?" said the queen. "Did you gain no knowledge from rumour ?"

"Oh, there were rumours enough, truly," answered the man; "but as fast as one came, it was contradicted by another. Some said that the troops at Perpignan had revolted, and some that Monsieur le Grand had killed Cardinal Mazarin. Others brought word that Monsieur de Noyers had tried to poison the king; and others, that the king had kicked Fontrailles for hunting in short boots."

At the name of a place where both De Blenau and herself had suffered so much, and which was associated in her mind with every horrible ides, Pauline clasped her hands over her eyes, as if to shut out the frightful visions it recalled.

"No, madame," replied the officer, "I am errormanded to conduct Monsieur de Elenan, as quietla as possible, to Tarascon : and allows me to remove your majesty that the time is passing fast."

RICHELILU

De Blenau made a sign to the officer, indicating that he was ready. He saw that Pauline's hand still covered her eyes, and, wishing to spare her the pain of such a parting, he bowed profoundly to the queen, and moved in silence to the door. The queen and Madame de Beaumont saw his intention, and remained silent; but as he reached the door, he could not resist the desire to turn and look once more upon her whom he was leaving perhaps for ever-who had so nearly been his bride-whom he had loved so long-who had undergone so much for him. It was excusable, but the delay defeated his purpose. The sudden silence alarmed Pauline -she raised her eyes-she saw De Blenau in the act of departing, and the last fixed painful glance with which he regarded her. All but her love was at that moment forgotten ; and starting wildly forward, she threw berself into his arms, and wept bitterly on his bosom. But Madame de Beaumont advancing, goaly discurated her from his embrace i facility and the open entry her motion's abouter i fact the Barney, will a best roady to break, fiel quickly from a scope that his fortitude could append the loager.

5 J

÷,

CHAPTER XII

Which shows that a man who has climbed a inclusion may stamble at a Pebble; or the consequences, of one oversight.

Wz must once more go back to Narbonne, ha order to explain the events which had there takes place, since the day on which Chevigni presented himself of the treaty with Spain. Cing Mars, hearing nothing of his agent, of course concluded that he was quietly pursuing his way ; and willing to take every precaution to insure the success of his plans, he spent the next day in riding over to the camp at Perpignan, and endeavoring to ingratiate himself with the officers and soldiers of that part of the army. The splendor of his train and equippages, the manly beauty of his person, his dexterily in all warlike exercises, and the courteous familiarity of his manners, attracted all eyes, and won all hearts ; and Cinq Mars, well contented with the day's success, did not return to Narbonne till very late at night.

208

•

The next morning had been appointed for hunting; but that day the king was rather later than usual, and Cing Mars, as he waited in the saloon till Louis should be ready, took up a romance which some of the pages had left behind, and stretching his tall elegant form at length in the window-seat, he began reading; to pass the time.

The book was The true History of Don Cleofas of Castile, and as Cino Mars read on, he became interested in the fate of the hero. He had opened the volume at that part where the knight rescues Matilda from the power of the Moors. He was in the act of persuading her to descend the staircase in the tower, at the foot of which the repentant renegade waited with their horses ; and Cinq Mars. whose whole heart was full of romance, at one moment entered entirely into the vehement and almost angry arguments of Don Cleolas, and then again felt for the alarm and doubt of the timid Matilda.

So much, indeed, was he occupied, that as some one passed to and from the king's chamber, he scarcely raised his eyes to noticatswho it was ; and when at last he did so, he found w i 'only a page The tale went on, and his eye ran from scatter to sentence, to see if the fears of Matilda proved fatal to their hopes of escape ; and his best with anxiety and alarm as the wind blew the door to behind them, and they listened to hear whether the Moors had been awakened by the sound. It was at that moment that another step met his ear, whose firm, decided pace splainly told that it was not that of a domestic. Cinq Mars raised his eyes, and as he did so, they encountered those of Chavigni, who was passing on to the apartments of the king. Chavigni bowed, with a peculiar smile. Cinq Mars returned his salutation, and again began reading his book. "It is all over with your power, Monsieur de Chavigni," thought the master of the horse; "I will but read out this adventure of the two lovers, and then I will come to disturb your idte-didt with his majesty."

RIOHELIEU.

Cinq Mars read on. "Don Cleofas and his fair Matilda descended the staircase in the city walls ; but before they reached the gate, the alarm was given, and by the time they had mounted their horses, all the garrison was armed for their pursuit. Flights of arrows followed them from the ramparts as they fled, and a body of the horse kept close upon their track. But still Don Cleofas pursued his way, the bridle of Matilda's horse thrown over his arm, and his right hand ready to grasp his sword. should the moors overtake them. It was up the ascent of a steep hill that he took his way, and at the top he reined in his horse, on the edge of the crag which looked down into a peaceful valley be-Don Cleofas sprang to the ground, gave one low. look to the Moors who were following fast behind, and, as a last resource, catching Matilda in his arms, he leaped from the brink, bounding from rock to rock in the descent, with the agility of an izzard, till at length he reached the deepest part of the valley below."-All this was told at full length in The terrors of Matilda, the daring the romance, of the knight, the angry gestures of the Moors, the steepness of the descent, and the calm beauty of the valley, were all dilated upon and describe with the utmost minuteness and accuracy ; very much delighted Cinq Mars, but took him a long time to read; so that just at the moment he had got them safely to near the end of their journey, the door of the king's apartments again opened, and Chavigni passed through the room on his return. Perceiving this to be the case Cinq Mars thought that he might as well go on with his book; which he had just begun to do, when Fontrailles entered the saloon and interrupted him. "In the name of Heaven, Cinq Mars," exclaimed he, " what are you about ?"

"I am waiting till the king is ready," answered the master of the horse composedly, scarcely tak ing his eyes from the romance.

"And is it possible," asked Fontrailles, in a tone of angry astonishment, " that you have lain here reading that drivelling book, and suffered Chavigni to be again so long with the king ?"

"Again " said Cinq Mars, becoming more attentive; "he only passed once that I saw."

"And ought he to have been there once, if that were all ""asked Fontrailles. "But let me tell you, Cinq Mars, he was there last night for more than an hour. Oh, Cinq Mars! Cinq Mars! is this a time, when our lives, our fortunes, and our country's weal are at stake, to sit there doxing over a romance, and see our bitterest enemy have access to the king's ear, but too easy to be abused 7 Depend on it, something more will come of this."

"But why did you not let me know," demanded the master of the horse, "that he had seen the king last night?"

"I learned it but this moment," replied Fontrailles. "But here comes a page from the king's apartments. A message to you, Cinq Mars, on my life."

The page approached. 'I am commanded by the king's majesty to acquaint you, moneceneer, said he, addressing the grand ecuyer, "that he feels himself too unwell to enjoy the pleasares of the chase to day. But he desires that his indissilion may not prevent you, and the other gentlemen invited, from following your sport." And having delivered this message, the attendant withdrew, without waiting for any reply.

"Well, now you see, Fontrailles," exclaimed Cinq Mars, "there is nothing wrong here. Nothing can be more kind and considerate than, when ill himself, to wish us to follow the sport without him."

An expression of heavy, deep-seated thought at upon the brow of the clear sighted, suspicious Fortrailles. He took two or three steps up and down the apartment, and then, turning to Cinq Mars with a countenance in which painful anxiety and bitter irony were strangely mingled, he considered his companion with an attentive glance, which ran rapidly over his tall elegant figure. "Cinq Mars," said he, "you are more than six feet high, and could spare a few inches of your height upon an occasion—even were they to make you shorter by the head, you would still be a tall man. As for me, I am short already, and emonot afford to be cut down. A word to the wise—I go to shelter myself from pruning-knives. Do as you please. We shall meet in this world or the next. Adieu !!" And turning on his heel, he quitted the saloon.

"The man is mad!" said Cinq Mars, aloud as Fontmilles left him-" irretrievably cracked !" And jumping up from the window seat, he descended to the court yard, called the hantsmen together, mounted his horse, and led the chase as merrily as if nothing had happened but the ordinary trifles of a day.

Had he known all, very different would have been his (celings. The visit of Chavigni to the king was one on which the fate of France depended; and the willy statesman had entered the apartments of the monarch, prepared equally to guard every word he uttered himself, and to watch every turn of Louis's irritable and unsteady mind. The king was leaning on a table in his cabinet dressed for the bunting expedition we have mentioned, and more than an unusual degree of peevisnness was expressed in his countenance. "Well, sir," exclaimed Louis, as Chavigui catered, "what other bad news have you the pleasure of bringing me 7 What other friends have turned traitors ? What other power is about to invade my dominions? By the Holy Trinity' I never see your face but it makes me melancholy."

Chavigni was not sorry to perceive the king's irritability. The night before he had conveyed to him, in general terms, the news of a private treaty existing between Spain and some that Louis supposed his friends, and had promised to bring him that morning the names of the different parties engaged. He now came to fulfit that promise, and he saw that the former information had been working upon Louis's mind, and raised in it a degree of impatience and anger that would fall heavily on the first object presented to his resentment. Nor did Chavigni doubt that he would easily be able to turn it in the direction that he wished.

"My liege," replied he. " when I find your majesty's confidence betrayed, your dominions threatened," and even your person in danger, it is my daty to give your majesty timely warning, although the news be as unpleasant for me to bear as for you to hear. To conceal treason is the part of a traitor, and as one of your majesty's council--"

"Well, well, sir," cried Louis, interrupting him. "spare your exculpation. The executioner is doubtless guiltless of the blood he sheds, but it is not a right honorable trade."

An angry flush came over Chavigni's countenance, but it quickly subsided; and he replied calmly, "I came here, as your majesty knows, to give you more minute particulars of the information I rendered you yesterday ; and to prove to you that some whom you esteem your desrest functions, are the service some who are your nearcest relations, are the service traitors in France. The sillation one can more unpleasant than for myself, for there are some to whom I wish well, that have in this merited their death: therefore, sire, if you find it too painful to hear, in the name of Heaven, let it rest in silence. I will high me home and burn the papers I have brought here; and satisfied with having done my duty, only hold myself ready, when the misfortunes which must follow, do arrive, to serve your majesty with my hand and heart." And bowing profoundly, Chavigni took a step back, as if about to quit the presence.

"Hold, Monsieur de Chavigni, said the king, "you have done your duty, we do not doubt. But unpleasant tidings, sir, are not to be received pleasantly. Were it ourself alone that they aimed at, perhaps we might leave treason to overreach itself; but as the welfare of our kingdom is at stake, we must look the frowning truth in the face, and prepare to punish the guilty, be they who they may, that we may insure the safety of the innocent."

"Louis the Just," said Chavigni, sdvancing and using a term which had been bestowed upon the king by the astrologers of the day from his having been born under the sign Libra, "Louis the Just will not act otherwise than justly, and if I prove not to your majesty's satisfaction that a most dangerous conspiracy is on foot, let your royal indignation fall upon me."

"" I know not what you call a conspiracy, sir," answered Louis, his mind reverting to the plans of Cinq Mars, to which, as we have seen, he had given his own sanction only a few nights before, and for the discovery of which he felt as much alarm as if Richelieu possessed the power of punishing him also.

"The conspiracy I speak of, sire," rejoined the statesman, " is formed not only to oblige your majeity to change your ministers but-"

"I can conceive no plan for obliging me to change ny ministers," interrupted the king. "You must ave mistaken. Monsieur de Chavigni; perhape the persons whom you style conspirators, have only in view to make use dutiful petition and remonstrance, in which case I should give their arguments all due weight and consideration. Therefore, if this be the information you bring, I wish to hear no more.

RICHELIEG.

Long accustomed to observe every particular point of weakness in the king's mind, Chavigni at once convinced the whole train of Louis's thoughts, and judged from the very alarm which he saw in the monarch's countenance, that if the cardinal's power could once he re-established, it would be more unbounded than ever; and as these ideas passed through his mind, they called a transient smile upon-this lip.

"Why do you smile, eir!" demanded the king, sharply.

"Pardon me, sire !" answered Chavigni. 'But it was, that you should think me so weak as to trouble you upon such a subject. If leaguing with the enemies you have fought and conquered be humble pétition; if bringing foreign troops to invade your dominions be dutiful remoustrance; if promising to deliver the strong places of France into the bands of Spain be loyalty and faith,—then have I unnecesarily disturbed your repose."

Chavign's speech worked upon the king as he expected. "How say you" exclaimed Louis, his cyce flashing fire. "Who has had the hardihood to unite himself to Spain-our sworn enemy-our mortal foe ?-Prove your assertion, sin-Prove that such a traitor exists in our dominions; and were he our own brother, we would doom him to death."

Chavigni instantly caught at the idea. "Sorry I am to say, sire," he replied, "that your majesty has but too truly divised the person. The Duke of Orleans, unhappily, is the chief of this dangerous cosspiracy. Behold, my liege, his name to this treat? with Spain ;" and artfully contrivice to come at the greater part of the names with his hand in health it hefore the king, he pointed out the great sprawling " Gaston," which stood the first on the list of signatures.

Louis instantly recognised his brother's handwriting. "Gaston of Orleans! Gaston of Orleans!" he exclaimed, "will nothing satisfy you ! Must you beiray your country to her chemics, as well as to plot against your brother's life magicians and astrologers ?"

We have already had occasion to remark, that Louis, deeply imbued with all the superstitions of the age, put full faith in every part of astrology, and dreaded nothing more than the effects of enchantment. Nor could any thing free his mind from the idea, that his brother had, in former times, conspired against his life, with certain magicians who were actually executed for the crime ; one among others being the famous Père Le Rouge, whom we have more than once noticed in this sage history. The Duke of Orleans himself escaped with a temporary banishment, but the circumstance still rankled in the king's mind ; and at present the anger which might perhaps have turned aside from Cinq Mars, had Chavigni at first suffered the favourite's name to appear, now burst with full force upon the less favored Gaston.

"Issu - a warrant for his instant arrest," exclaimed the king. " By Heaven, he shall not escape more than another man."

" May it plaase your majesty " answered Chavigni, "to sign the warrant yourself. This is a case of no simple conspiracy, where the king's brothor is at its head, and many of the first in the kingdom its supporters ; and the warrants ought not to be simple lettres de catchet of council, but ought to bear the myal signature."

" Well, sir," replied the king, " have the warrants prepared, and I will sign them. I am going non to hund and at my return we will examine these paers and speak farther." "I have the warrants drawn out here," said the statesman, not choosing to let the first impression subside. "It will not detain your majesty a moment; I felt convinced that you would not allow justice to slumber, and therefore had them prepared. This is against the body of Gaston of France, Duke of Orleans," he continued, looking at one of the papers.

"Well, give it to me !" exclaimed the king, taking up a pen ; "it shall be done at once."

Chavigni put the warrant in Louis's hand, and looked at him with intense feeling and a triumphant smile as he hastily wrote his signature to it. "Now," thought Chavigni, "I have you, one and all. Now, proud Cinq Mars, and calculating Bouillon, you are in my powor! He signs the warrant against his own brother, and he dare not let you escape i" and, countersigning the warrant, he put a second into the king's hand,..." That is against the Duke of Bouillon, sire " and he calmy took up the first, and placed it in his portfolio.

"The Duke of Bouillon !" exclaimed Louis, with a sudden start, remembering the orders he had sent him, and terrified lest Richelieu should have discovered them. "Is his name to that paper ?"

"No, sire !" answered the statesman ; " it is not. But in the treaty itself, there is abundant proof of concurrence; and it was on its way to him in Italy when it was discovered. The same messenger bore it that conveyed to him your orders to march his troops into France :" and Chavigni fixed his keen penelrating glance upon the king's countenance. Lonis turned away his head, and signed the warrant; while Chavigni proceeded to place before him that against Fontrailles, and subsequently one which authorised the arrest of Cinq Mars.

" How !" exclaimed the king, " here are the first and most loyal men in my kingdom. Monsieur de Chavigni, this is going too bar!"

15

VOL. II.

"Their names, my liege," answered Charlent "are affired to the treasonable treaty in my band

RICHELIEU,

"It cannot be !" cried Louis, an expression of painful apprehension coming over his countenance : "It cannot be ! My faithful, loyal Cing Mars is no traitor. I will never believe it !" And he threw himself into a seat, and covered his eyes with his hands.

Clavigni opened the treaty calmly and briefly recapitulated the principal articles. "The first item is, my liege," he proceeded, "that Spain shall instantly furnish ten thousand men to enter France by the way of Flanders; and for a security to his Catholic majesty, a second item provides, that the Duke of Bonillon shall place in his hands, for the time being, the Principality of Sedun. A third goes on to arrange, that five principal fortified towns of France shall be given into the hands of Spain; and the whole concludes, with a solemn alliance, offensive and defensive, between the conspirators and the Spanish king.—And to this treaty," added he, in a firm, deep tone of voice, "stand the mames of Ging Mars and Fontrailles."

"Cinq Mars has been deceived, misled, abused !" cried the king, with a degree of agitation almost amounting to agony.

"That will appear on his trial, my liege," rejeined Chavigni ; and then wishing rather to soften the hard task he called upon Louis to perform, he added in a gentler manner, " Your majesty was born der the sign Libre, and have always merited the name of Just. If any thing in extenuation of his fault appear in the case of Monsieur le Grand Ecuyer, it can be taken into your merciful consideration after his arrest; but having calmly given an order for the imprisonment of your own royal brother, your majerty cannot, will not, show the manifest partiality of letting a person equally culpable P6+ May I once more request your majesty to sign the warrant !"

"Well, well !" cried Louis, enatching up the pes. "But romember, Cinq Mars must be pardoned. He has been deceived by that treacherous Duke of

RIGHELIEV.

Bouillon and the oily Fontrailles. Oh, he is all honor and loyalty have I not experienced a thousand instances of his affection ? It is false ! it is false ? And he dashed down the pen without using it.

Chavigni gazed on him for a moment with a feel ing very nearly allied to contempt. "Well then, your majesty." he said at length, "is it your pleasure that I cause the arrest of the Dukes of Orleans and Bouillon, with Monsieur de Fontrailles, and others concerned in this conspiracy, and let Monsieur de Cinq Mars know that Louis the Just makes a distinction between him and other men ?"

"No, no, Chavigni," replied Louis, mournfully; "give me the paper-I will sign it.-But Cinq Mors must be saved. He has been deceived.-I will sign it;" and turning away his head, he wrate his name with a trembling hand. But still he continued to hold the warrast, as if unwilling to part with it, repeating more than once in a tone rather of entrogty than command, "Indeed, "indeed, Chavigni, he must be saved !?"

"Will your majesty look at this part of the treaty to see that 1 have stated it correctly "" and the statesman, offering the papers to the king. Louis laid down the warrant to receive them; and Chavigni instantly raising the order for the arrest of Cinq Mars from the table, placed it in his portfolio with the rest. Louis saw it was gone beyond his recall; and propring the treaty from his hands, hid the designs of that great unsbrinking politician, who had already so long used him for his own purposes.

RICHELICU.

The unfortunate monarch, also, was but too well aware of his own want of energy, and of the unsupported situation in which he had left himself; and yielding to his ancient dread of Richelieu, he charged Chavigni with a multitude of excelpstory messages to the minister, calling him his best/friend and his cousin, and adding various civil speeches and professions, which both Chavigni and the cardinal knew how to estimate.

"There are many other porsons, sire," said the stateman, as he was about to depart, " who are implicated more or less in this unhappy conspiracy; but as their guilt is either in a minor degree, or their rank less elevated, I will not trauble your majesty for part your personal signature to the warrants against them. In the mean time, allow me to hint that the king ought not to be seen honting with traitors when they are known to be see."

"No, no," replied Louis, mournfully; "I am in no mood for hunting now. But where go you, Monsteur Chavigni T You will not leave me for long," udded the king, feeling that he must have some one to lean on, and little caring who, so that they yielded him support. "You will not leave me for long in this case of danger."

"I am about to proceed to Corneille," replied Chavigr. " to order up a body of the cardinal's guard. At present, I have no escort but a few servants. We are surrounded by the retainers of the different conspirators, and, were 1 to attempt the execution of your majesty's warrants, we might meet with opposition. But I will soon set that at rest, and before to-morrow morning there shall be a thousand men in Narbonne, traly devoted to your maiestr's service."

The king gave an involuntary shudder , and Cha. vigni, with a mockery of profound respect, which he (elt but little, took leave and quitted the preserve

The moment he was gone, Louis called to one of the attendants, and carefully shutting the door when he had entered, "François," said he, " your are a silent, cautious man-l can trust you : go to Monsieur le Grand Ecuyer, and if he is alone, tell him that France is a climate dangerous for his health, to betake himself claswhere, and that speedily. But if there is any one with him. merely say that the king feels himself too anwell to enjoy the pleasures of the chase to day ; but that he desirea that his indisposition may not prevent the gentlemen invited from following their sport. But, François, watch well Cinq Mar's return ; find him out alone, and give him the first message. Only beware, that in it the king's name is never mentioned. Do you understand ?"

The page bowed profoundly, but still maintained the same unbroken silence, and retired to fulfil the king's commands. The presence of Fontrailles, however, prevented him from delivering the warning, until the master of the horse returned from bunting, when he found an opportnaity of speaking to him alone. Such a caution, delivered by the king's own page, also delivered by the king's own page, also delivered by the king's own page, also delivered by the constraint of the favorite; and though it was by this time fate, he sent a servant to see if the city gates were shut. The servant scarcely gave himself the trouble to inquire, but returning immediately, informed his master that they were. Cinq Mars stayed—and before the next morning, every avenue from Nationne was occupied by the cardinal's guard.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Containing a journey, a discovery, and a strange suger-

I HAVE known some persons in the world who gliding quietly through life, have floated on app

the stream of time like a boat on the w broad and tranquil river, carried on by this tide of prosperity, and lighted to their jour by the cloudless sun of happiness. And I with others, whose star seemed to rise in hold its course through storms, and to set darkness than that which gave it birth. continued jey loses its first zest, and units sorrow its first poignancy; habit robs ev of its acuteness; and care that is long brings along with it the power of longer (It is the souden transition from joy to is the source of human suffering, adding t ness of regret for past enjoyment to all of present distress. It was thus with Claude de Blenau. A es had been nearly fulfilled; hope had all into certainty; Pauline was almost his o he was snatched from the bosom of joy ty to new scenes of misery and danger. last hours ceme back to his memory li those bright visions that sometimes visit ber, with every part so truly told, so faithf that they become too like reality, and t our hearts are full of scenes that we have pleasures that we have lost, the pageant we find it but a dream.

When once he had torn himself from F objects round him called forth little of D attention; and the carriage in which he rolled on for many leagues before he had ly recovered his tranquility even to think nor points of his situation. The moon, their departure shone bright and clear on masses of the forest, had by this time su the horizon; the darkness which had fol decline had also passed away; the gray dawn had warmed into the bright bluss bard the previses rub be early morning, and the new-risen sun be over a dewy world, that awoke sparklin ing, as if for joy at his approach.

223

which, at any other time, would have called up a thousand remembrances of the happy days and hunter sports of his youth, scarcely now roused him from the revery in which he was plunged; and if he looked round, or spoke to the person who conducted him, it was merely to ascertain in what direction they were going or what was the ultimate destination of their journey. Never before had he so completely abandoned himself to despondency; but as a second and third day passed, he began to recorer from the first bitterness of his feelings, and endeavored to draw from the officer the precise come with which he was charged, and what circumstances of suspicion had arisen against him. But no farther information was to be procured. The officer continued firm in the same story he had told the queen. -that his orders were to conduct him to Tarascon, and that he was quite ignorant of the circumstanstances which led to his arrest. And with this Do Blenau was obliged to be satisfied.

During the journey the officer showed much civility and attention to the prisoner, though he took good care to place a guard at the door of his chamber when they stopped for the night, which was always at the house of one of those private agents of the government already mentioned, with whose dwellings the officers of the cardinal's guard were generally acquainted. After proceeding, however, for several days, he plainly perceived that nothing could be further from De Blenau's thoughts than any plan for making his escape, and, in consequence the watch he kept over his prisoner became far less strict, which afforded the count many opportunities of communicating freely with the persons at the various places where they stopped for horses or refreshmeut.

The arrest of Cinq Mars and several others, with the full restoration of the cardinal's power, was at that moment, in France.one of those topics of some der and interest, which seem necessary from tools of time to keep up the sp rits of the gossigging classes society; and though the good folks at inns and elsewhere found the appearance of a prisoner, escorted by a body of the cardinal's guard, to act as a great check upon their natural loquacity; yet, as the officer was somewhat of a bon virund, and rather attached to his bottle, the awe inspired by his functions was not so strong as to prevent the news of the grand ecuyer's misfortune from reaching the ears of De Blenau, who easily concluded that, from their well-known intimacy, suspicion had fallen upon himself.

The prisoner and his conductors at length began to approach that part of the country where the resetablished minister held his court, to which all his own retainers and friends were now flocking, together with many others, who, led by hope or impelled by fear, hastened to offer their servile adulation to a man they in general detested. The roads were thus thronged with people, and many a gay cavalcade passed by the carriage in which De Blenau was beene along, the horsemen looking for a moment into the vehicle out of curlosity, but quickly turning away their eyes again, lest they should be obliged to acknowledge some acquaintance with a person who had fallen under the cardinal's displeasure.

It was night when they arrived at Montolicu, and De Blenau asked his conductor if he intended to stop there till morning.

"No, Monsieur le Comte," replied the officer ; "we must proceed as speedily as possible to Mirepoix, where I expect orders for my farther conduct."

"Then you go to Tarascon, in the Pyrenees," said De Blenau. "I thought his eminence was at the city of that name by the banks of the Rhone, opposite Beaucaire."

"He was there some time ago," replied the officer; "but he has since gone to the mountains, where, doctors say, there are waters which have great virtues in sickness like his. For my part, t slways thought the springs there very bad, and neither fit for man nor beast. But, nevertheless, we must hasten on, sir."

The next place they stopped at was Corneille ; and, according to his custom, the officer remained with De Blenau in the carriage, while the troopers arranged every thing that was necessary for proceeding on their journey. There seemed, however, to be a considerable bustle among the men ; and after waiting patiently for a few minutes, the officer drew back the curtain, and thrusting his head from the window, inquired the cause of delay ? The answer he received, imported that no fresh horses could be procured, and those which had drawn them so far were incapable of proceeding even to the next town. "How happens it that there are no horses ?" demanded he impatiently ; " there ought always to be horses reserved for the use of the goverument." To this it was replied, that so many people had passed to the court at Tarascon, that every horse which could be hired, even at an exhorbitant price, had been carried away.

The officer paused, as if doubting what course to pursue; but there being no remedy, he was obliged to alight, in order to pass the night at Cornelle; taking care, however, to despatch one of the troopers to Mirepoix, to bring any orders which might be waiting for him in that towo.

The moon was up, and as De Blenau descended from the carriage, he perceived a little stream dashing and glistening over the wheel of a mill, that stood dark and defined against the moonlight sky. It was to this they were apparently proceeding; and as they approached nearer, there was seen an irregular part of the building projecting from the rest, which seemed appropriated to the particular use of the miller. At the same time, on a wooden staircase, which wound up the outside of the house, appeared a man, holding a light, and habited in one of those dusty jackets, which have been the inset int of flour-grinders from all generations. All moment I speak of, he was holding a converse with one of the troopers, and, by his quick articulation and busy gestures, seemed engaged in making remonstrances, without any great effect.

BIOHELIEU.

"What does he say ?" exclaimed the officer, who caught a few words of their conversation as he got out of the carriage. "That we cannot stop here the night? Give him a cuff of the head, Joly, to teach him better mauners to the cardinal's gu.rd. By heavens! he shall find me horses to-night, or he shall lodge me till to-morrow !"

"Stay, if you will, Sir Officer," rejoined the miller, reasing his voice—"but I 'ell you that you ought not to stay; and as for laving a finger on me—you know I serve the cardinal as well as you, and you dare not!"

"Dare not" cried the officer, who was by this time mounting the stairs, catching the miller by the collar, and striking him a slipht blow— 'You are a refractory rascal, sir ! Open the door of your house, or I will throw you over the staircase. Come, Monsieur de Blenau, follow me."

The miller offered no resistance, but threw wide the door, and let the officer pass in. De Blenxu tion; but as he went by the miller, who held the door open, he heard him mutter to himself in an under voice, "He shall pay for it with his blood." in a deep bitter tone of determined hatred.tha: made the count turn round, expecting to see the ferocious countenance of an assassin. Nothing, however, could be more different from the sppearance of the speaker, who was a smooth, pale-faced man, whose look expressed little besides peaceful tranquility and patient resignation.

The room into which they entered was a large uncouth chamber, filled with various articles of household furniture, the unusual assemblage of which showed that it was used for most of the different purposes of life. There was a bed in one corner, with a large screen, or paravent, half drawn, before it. Beside the fire hung a row of copper saucepar jî,

LICHELIEU.

and cooking utensils; round about were several saddles, and other pieces of horse furniture; and in the centre was a large table, with two or three half emptied bottles and some glasses, which hore marks of having been recently used; and at the same time a long bench was placed at one side of the table, with three single seats on the other.

On the opposite side of the apartment was a wooden partition, evidently new, which seened to separate what had once been one large chamber into two, with a door of communication between them.

"Oh, ho!. Mousieur Godefroy." exclaimed the officer, looking at the table, and then turning a significant glance to the online. "So, you have been carousing, and did not like to let us share in your good cheer.--But come, we will not be sent away like a dog without his dinner. Let us tasts your Burgundy; and if you were to hay three of those plump boudins upon the fire, they might savour the wine."

"You are very welcome, Sir Officer, to any thing the house affords," replied the miller, neither civilly nor sulkily. "Help yourself to the boulins, while I go down for the wine."

"They say in my province, Monsieur de Blennu," said the officer, placing a scat for the prisoner near the fire, "Qui dort dine, et qui fait l'amour soupe, Now, as we have neither slept nor dined, and have no one to make love to, let us any at least."

De Blenau's only reply was, that he had no appetite; which seemed considerably to surprise the officer, who, as soon as the miller had brought in the wine, and his supper was ready, fell to with no small eageness, and did not leave off till he had transferred the greater part of the trencher's contents to his stomach. The miller seemed more inclined to follow the officer's example than De Blenau; and his anger having apparently subsided, he pressed his guest to continue the mealin so sociable and friends. If a manner, that De Blenau could scattery com ceive that the words he had heard has he entered.

RICHELIEU.

had been any thing but the effect of momentary itritation. But shortly after he had again cause to after his opinion; the eagerness with which the miller invited his companion to drink, producing bottle after bottle of different wines, generally denied by their price to persons in his station, of life 3 and the subdued glance of triumph with which he viewed the various stages of intoxication at which the officer gradually arrived, caught De Blenau's attention, and excited his suspicion. However, the vengeance which the miller meditated, was of a very different nature from that which the count imag ined. Nothing which could, by any chance, recoil upon himself ever entered his thoughts, and his plan reached no farther than to render the man who had offended him deeply culpable in the eyes of Richelieu, thus calling upon his head that relentless anger which would be much more effectual vengeance than any puntshment he could himself

Two or three hours had passed in this manner during which time the officer had made various efinflict.

forts to resist the fascination of the bottle, often pushing it away from him, as if resolved not to taste another drop, and then again, as he became heated in conversation, drawing it back and filling his glass with an almost unconscious hand, when the sound of a horse's feet was heard without and starting up he declared that it was news from Mirepoix, and

The moment he had quitted the room, the miller staggered towards the door. approached De Blenau, glanced his eyes rourd the "Photocured be memau, granced ms-eyes rourd the chamber, and then addressed him in a whisper, "What a moment," he said, "for a prisoner to make his secape, while that drankard's senses are confined with when 10

De Bienau started at the suddenness of the pre posal, and eyed his companion with an inquirie confused with wine !"

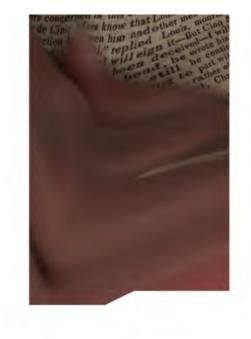

possi, and eyed ins companion he replied at leng glance. "If you allude to me," he replied at leng "I thank you, but I have no thought of escapie "You have not" said the miller, apparently

228

٤

1

Ì

It with two papers, one folded up and markother open, and scenningly hardly finished, and were scattered various basnets and vials, in appeared to contain the medicanents for a sick it and on one of the chairs was thrown a long ord, together with a poniard and a brace of stols.

De Blenau advanced to the table, and taking up the open paper, ran his eye hastily over its contents. In so doiny, his own mame met his sight ; and forgetting the caution he had received, to make speed and quit the apartment as soon as he had possessed himself of it, he could not refrain from reading on —" With regard to Monsieur the Count de Blenau," the paper proceeded, "the prisoner feels perfectly convinced that he was always ignorant of the treaty and the designs of the conspirators. For, Monsieur de Cinq Mars particularly warned him (the prisoner) never to mention the circumstance before the count, because that he was not to be made acquainted therewith ; and moreover—"

As De Blenau read, a deep groun came upon his car, evidently proceeding from some one in the same room with himself, and, holding up the lamp, he endeavored to discover who it was that had uttered it; but in lifting it suddenly, the feeble light was at once extinguished, and the whole chamber remained in darkness, except where a gleam came through the door way of the other room.

"Godefroy !" Godefroy !" exclaimed a faint voice, "do not put ont the light-why have you left me so long ?-1 am dying, I am sure I am dying,"

"I will bring another light," said the count, " and be with you instantly." And forgetting, in the hurry of the moment, his peculiar situation, and the caution which ought to have accompanied it, he hastened into the other spartment, where the officer still lay undisturbed in his druckes slowlesses, and taking one of the rosin candles from the table turned to give what succour he could to the pern whose faint voice he had heard.

RICHELLEU

On re-entering the chamber with the stronger ght which he now brought, his eyes fell upon the rawn curtains of an alcove bed at the farther exremity; and approaching quickly, he pulled them pack, shading the candle as well as he could, to prevent its glare from offending the eyes of the sick person.

Bat his precaution was in vain. Light and darkness had become the same to the pale inanimate form before him. De Blenau saw that, during the moment of his absence, being had passed away; and holding the light nearer to the bed, he thought he could trace, in the disfigured countenance that lay in ashy paleness upon the pillow, the features of the grand ecuyer's Italian lute-player, Villa Grando.

He was engaged in examining them more attentively, when some one silently laid their hand upon his arm, and turning quickly round, he beheld Chavigni, while the countenance of the miller appeared in the doorway, very little less pale than thit of the dead man. De Blenau's first impulse was to point to the dead man, while his eyes rested on the cuntenance of Chavigni, in which a slight degree of agitation showed itself for a moment, and then disappeared.

"" So !" said the statesman, regarding the lifeless body of Villa Grande, "he is dead, poor wretch !--Gone on that uncertain journey which lies before us all, like a land covered with a thick mist, whose paths, or whose termination, none of us can discover. But, to matters of life and moment," he continued. "What do you here, Monsieur de Blenau ?"

"I should suppose, sir, that you are better acquainted with the object of my journey than I am myself," replied the count. "You must be well aware that it was undertaken against my will."

"You have mistaken me, sir," said Chavie

RICHELIED.

"The end of your journey hither I am well aware of. But how came you in this chamber I What do you with that paper which was in your hand ? I expect a straightforward answer."

"Did I give you any, sir," replied De Blenau, "my answer should be straightforward. But you ought to have known me better than so proudly to demand a reply, when you are usentitled to interrogate me. Being a prisoner, I must be guarded as such, though I tell you at once I have no intention of trying to escape; and being defenceless, you may take these papers from me, though they are material proofs of my innocence. However, I will rely upon your justice --mpon your honor,--that whatever charges be brought against me, the contession of this man may be opposed to them in my justification."

"Monsieur de Blenau," I wish you would sometimes give n e an excuse for doubting your sincerity; for then I could see the fate which is like to betide you, without regret. When you were liberated from the Bastile, I told you that the eye of an angry man was upon you, and warned you as a friend to avoid all cause of suspicion. The minister has never forgotten you. You were the first who brought a shadow over his dominion-I hope, therefore, that your innocence can be proved beyond a doubt; for mercy and tend mess between you and the cardinal are out of the question. Nevertheless, I cannot let you keep this paper, which belongs to the council ; but I will take care that any thing which it contains in your favor shall not be lost. In the mean while I shall be obliged to send you to Lyons ; and Heaven speed you as safely out " of this scrape as out of the last."

" If perfect innocence of any crime towards the state can save me," said De Blenau, following Chavigni into the outer room, "I have nothing to fear."

16

"I hope it is so," replied the statesman.

VOL. 11.

w," he continued, turning to the miller, " let me Il you, Master Godefroy, that you are highly culable yourself, for leaving a state prisoner wholly rithout guard when you saw the officer, in whose austody he was, in such a state as this, Make no accuses, sir—it shall be remembered."

Chavigni now approached the dranken man, and tried to rouse him; but finding it in vain, he called in the sergeant, and writing a few words for his warranty, ordered him to conduct the officer, next morning, to Tarascon under arrest.

"Monsieur de Blenau," he continued, tarning to the count, "you will do me the favor of accompanying me to Montolieu. The horses attached to my carriage are fresher than those which drew you."

The promptitude with which Chavigni's orders were given, brought all the, preparations to a rapid conclusion. A few minates sufficed him to issue the necessary command for transferring the beggage which had been branch with De. Elesan to the other carriage; and adding a few clear rapid directions to the miller concerning the body of Villa Grande, the statesman was ready to accompany De Blonau before he had been a quarter of an hour in the house.

At Montolieu, De Blenau was pe mitted to rest a day, and was then sent forward under a fresh escort to Lyons. The prisoner was now hurried rapidly on his journey, travelling, the whole of the first night, and at last only stopping for a few hours to give him some repose at a village about eight, leagues from the city to which he was proceeding. As soon as daylight dawned, they again began their journey; and taking the lower read by the banks of the Rhone, gradually approached the ancient town of Lyons.

The first pause they made was a compelled one, upon the wooden bridge, situated on the river just below the town. This ontrance had been chosen to avoid the more populous suburbs; but the con-for owing to some circumstances o rest, which drew all the idle and the that spot, the bridge and the alleys ntirely covered with dense masses ings, which completely obstructed the difficulty the carriage was dragged hall ridge ; and then notwithstanding the exe he guard, it was obliged to stop. De I w back the leather curtain which obstruct ew, and turning his eyes towards the river, a rst upon his sight which at once explain m the cause of such an assemblage. There was a small but magnificent galley n way slowly to the landing-place. The r is adorned with streamers; the deck gli th all the splendid apparal of a court, the r ere clothed in rich uniform, scarcely dif om that of the guards which flanked each bu rs; gold, and jewels, and blazonry shown an it the spot on which all eyes rested was a nopy of rich embroidery, upheld above the silver poles by four officers of the guard, in nanner as to keep off the rays of the sun, b pede the breeze of the river from playing bile of rich velvet cushions, on which, am mp and display of a sovereign prince lay the ted form of the Cardinal de Richelieu. untenance was calm and unmoved ; indee emed hardly to regard the scene around, list the conversation of an abbe, who stood m for the sole purpose of amusing him by y es and anecdotes during the voyage. Some wever, he would raise his eyes, and app eak to some of those who stood by; and the ance would rapidly turn towards a smaller nich attached by two long ropes, was tow the stern of his own galley. In that boat, I tween two of the cardinal's guard, sat th ident and unfortunate Cing Mars, and bi ion in misfortune. De Theu. All the anchelies.

and spirit of the master of the horse, which once aught him to scoff at the very idea of adversity as at a bugbear of the imagination, was now quelled and lost, and with a bending head, and eyes cast down, he sat perfectly motionless, like a lifeless but clegant statue. De Thou, on the contrary, calmly surveyed the passing scene. He seemed to have forgot that he was there as a prisoner, borne, a part of that barbarous triumph which his enemy was enjoying; and, even when his glance met that of the cardinal, his countenance remained undisturbed by any emotion of auger, or any expression of reproach.

I have said that Richelieu would sometimes turn his look towards the boat in which his captives were borne along; and still when he did so, a momentary gleam would lighten in his eyes, and he would hastily glance them round the multitude that lined the shores and the bridge. But there was no sound of gratulation met his ear, no acclamation for his regained ascendancy. The busy whisper of curiosity would stir among the people, or perhaps the murmur of compassion, as they gazed upon the victims about to be sacrificed to his vengeance. But there was no love to express; and fear changed their curses into the bitterness of silence.

Such was the scene in the midst of which De Blenau found himself, when the carriage stopped. He had just time to become aware of all its most painful circumstances, when the guards again opened a way through the people, and the vehicle passed on. The high round tower of Pierre-en-Scize, raising its dark mass above the rest of the prison, was the next thing that mct his view, and he doubted not that the place of his imprisonment was before him; but the carriage rolled on into the great Place Terreaux, where it suddenly drew up.

"Then I am not to be taken to Pierre-en-Scize ?" said De Blenau to the officer who had accompanied him from Montolieu.

"No, Monsieur le Comte," replied he, " Pierr

86 ?

The officer smiled. "Why, the e king himself is in the conspir he duke, you know more of his any one else-at least so we are to now beg you to descend." " You are under a mistake, sir," nau. "I know nothing of the duke the conspiracy." And following the tered a house in the Place Terrer been changed for the time from one offices of the city into a place of co offered all the security without th prison. The windows were grated, they looked out into the free world captive might sit there and forget th nied the power of joining the gay the ed along before his eyes in all the sumstan k of the statesman's consideration. For v days, too, he experienced every kind mas, a, and was permitted to enjoy all sort of was not destined to endure long; and sonment gradually became more rigorous which he had undergone in the Bastille. of books and writing materials was denied levery means of employing his thoughts studiously withheld. This mode of weakhe mind by leaving it to prey upon itself, effect even on De Blenau. He became irriand desponding; and as he received no inlin in regard to the charge against him, he beo conjure up a thousand vague unreal images, for this had continued for some days, he was rised by the door of his apartment opening one ht, at the moment he was about to retire to rest, charges

" G0

did a hop

-

20

١

ing admittance to the corrupt Judge Lafemas, and a person habited as one of the greffers of the a a person insorted as one of the fragment of the nurt. There are some who are cruel from fear, and some from motives of interest; but few, 1 ad some from monives of interest, out revi, a rust, who from natural propensity rejoice in the ufferings of a fellow-creature. Such, however, whenings of a lenow-creature. Such, nowever, was the character of Lafemas-at least if we may believe the histories of the time; and in the present instance he entered the chamber of De Blenau with a countenance which certainly expressed no great unwillingness in the performance of what is In this place we shall but give a small part of the always painful when it is a duty: conversation between De Blenau and the judge 5 for the course of examination which the latter pursued towards the prisoner was so precisely similar in its nature to that which he followed on a former occasion in the Bustille, that its repetition is un necessary, especially as our history is now hurry rapidly to its awful and inevitable conclusion. part of it, however, may sorve to illustrate

Id have been careful to keep y thing of this kind." Good night, Monsieur le Judg enau ; "do me the favour of sitt pose I may do the honors of my e be but a prison. I am glad to see ust you can inform me why I am I " Monsieur de Blenau," said the himself, " we will be frank with one are very well aware how deeply you in this conspiracy : and I will tell yo ample proofs of every thing. But at I know of a way by which you can a way which one or two highly honors embraced, baving been misled at first persons, but having returned to a sense honor, and confessed all they knew, the names of those they supposed to "I have no doubt, sir," replied the all and every thing you say is correct But there is one point; on which I am I am not aware of what that I can plead his mojesty's free permission and pardon."

" All this is very good, Monsieur le Comte," said Lafemas, his brows darkening; " but I must tell you that it will not serve the purpose you propose. I came here to you as a friend—" "And as a friend," interrupted De Blenau, " you

"And as a friend," interrupted De Blenau, "you brought with you that gentleman in black to take down my words, in case I should be at a loss to remember what I had said."

"I must once more tell you, sir," said the judge, "that this will not answer your purpose, for a full confession has been made by Mossieur de Cinq Mars since his condemnation."

"Since his condemnation!" exclaimed De Blenau. "Good God! is it possible that he is condemned ?"

Lafemas was little capable of understanding any of those finer feelings which brighten the dull void of human existence. He read from the black page of his own mind, and fancied that every other was written in the same dark character. All that he saw in the exclamation of De Blenau was fear for himself, not feeling for his friend; and he replied, "Yes, Monsieur le Compte, he is condemned to lose his head for the crimes of which he has been guilty: the question also formed part of his sentence, but this he has avoided by making a full confession, in which, as you may easily suppose, your name is very fully comprised."

a. "You may as well cease, sir," replied the count. "It may indeed be true that my unhappy friend is convi and has confessed his guilt juit no language for the luse will ever persuade me that, knowing sued townince, as he well does, he would say any in its nature hid implicate me.—I will further anoccasion in they that can possibly be asked of me necessary, sepsels. As to myself, I have nothing rapidly to its awfur. perfectly guiltless towards the part of 1, however. m, I can give no information, ions, involving a mnittitude or less degree ; but all fel red of the cardinal, and he sp r illegal, to discover the mos f the conspiracy, and to ford us parties to it to make con e afterward used as evidence elves, as well as others. As the De Blenau were, of course, very last command of Richelieu to Lafer ing Lyons, was to spare no power in order to make the prisoner crimit fore even granting him the form of suance of these directions, Lafema some days to torment De Blenau w terrogatories, mingled with menac ingeniously calculated either to frig into some confession of guilt, or to his guard by rousing his anger. M was carried into the chamber of

248

RIVERLEE

Denied all privileges usually conceded to pris oners, unacquainted with the precise charges to be brought against him, refused all legal assistance, and debarred the use of pen and ink. De Blenau clearly saw that Richelieu had resolved on his destruction, and merely granted him the form of a trial to gloss over his tyranny in the eyes of the people ; nevertheless, he prepared to defend himself as far as possible, and at all events to establish his innocence; for the honor of his good name, though it might not even tend to save him from the iujustice with which he was threatened. For this purpose he accurately examined his conduct since his liberation from the Bastille, and noted carefully every circumstance, that he might be enabled to prove the nature of all his occupations so correctly. that the impossibility of his joining in any conspiracy would be made evident. He found, however, that to do this effectually, some aid besides that of mere memory would be necessary, and possessing no other means of committing his thoughts to writing, he had recourse to the expedient of pointing some pieces of wood, which he procured from the jailer, and then by charring them in the lamp, he' was enabled to make notes upon some torn linen. preparatory to his trial. Being thus occupied the greater part of the night, his usual time of rest was: from day break to midday ; but ese night, a few days previous to the time appointed for his trial; he was disturbed in his occupation by the dull heavy clang of hummens in the great square before the prison. and proceeding to the window, he endeavored too ascertain the cause. Through the bars he could ; perceive various lights, and people moving about indifferent directions, but could not direct in what they were employed; and quitting the casement, he. returned to the niew and laborious operation of writing his notes, in the manner we have described: At length, wearied out, he threw himself woon his: bed, without taking off his clothes, and some fell invi to a profound sleep, which remained embroken till late the next day. It is probable that he might have slept still longer, had he not been aroused by his tormentor, Lalemas, who, standing by his bediate, with two of his inferior demons, roused him out of the happy forgetfulness into which he had fallen. "Rise, Monsieur de Blenau, rise!" said the judge, his eyes gleaming with malicious pleasure : "rise, here is something in the place which it is necessarry you should beliedd."

De Blenau, gwoke suddenly from his sleep, suffered himself to be conducted to the window, where the judge and his two followers placed themselves behind him, so as to obstruct his retreat, and in a manner to force upon him the sight of what was passing in the place.

The square of Terreaux was filled with an immense multitude, and there was a deep awful silence reigned among them. All eyes were turned towards a spot exactly opposite the window at which De Blenau stood, where there appeared a high raised scaffold, covered with a black cloth, and surrounded by a strong body of troops, who kept the multitude at a distance, without impeding their view of the dreadful scene which was acting hefore them. A large log of timber lay across the front of the scaffold, and beside it stood a tall brawny man, leaning on an immense axe, which seemed as if a giant's force would hardly wield it, so ponderous was its form. The Prevost of Lyons, dressed in black, and bearing his staff of office, stood on the other side with several of the civil officers of the city ; and a file of pikemen closed each flank of the scaffold, leaving the front open, as we have said, to the view of the spectators.

But it was the form of his unhappy friend, Cinq Mars, that first rivetted Do Blensan's attention; and he continued to gaze upon him with painful interest, while, standing beside the block on which he was to suffer, he calmly unlossed his colour and made the executioner cut away the glossy corres of his hair, which otherwise, falling down this second lar orders that their meeting should be mentioned to no man.

The next witness brought forward was the messenger who carried to De Blenau the king's permission to return to court, and who proved that, instead of finding the count at Moulins, to which, according to the king's command, he was bound to confine himself, he had been conducted by the count's page to Troyes in Champagne, where he found Monsieur de Blenau himself ready to set off for some other place. This witness also added, that he had learned in the town of Troyes, that Monsieur de Blenau had been absent one whole day, during which time he had visited the old castle of Mesuil St. Loup, and that at his return he did not go to the same hotel from which he had proceeded in the morning.

When the evidence was gone through, the president of Grenoble signified to the prisoner that he might speak in his own defence ; and though well assured that on his judges he could make no impression, De Blenau resolved not to allow the accusation to remain unrepelled, and replied at some length to what had been urged against him. He showed the impossibility of preparing any defence. when the nature of the charge had never reached his ears till that day. He pointed out that, though he had known and loved the unhappy Cinq Mars, their friendship was no proof that he was at all acquainted with the conspiracy for which the other had suffered; and that though he had met the Duke of Orleans, and received a letter from him, that was not sufficient to show him concerned in any plot against the state. He acknowledged that he had left the Bourbonnois without the king's permission; but he stated the powerful motives which had induced him to do so, and gave a correct account. from the notes he had prepared, of every moment of his time since he had been liberated from the Bastille. He further declared his innesence: he proved that he had been absent from all the principal scenes of the conspiracy; and ended by demanding that the confession of the Italian Villa Grande should be produced.

RICHELIKO.

The president of Grenoble turned his eyes upon Luforms; but that worthy judge assumed an air of perfect unconsciousness, and demanded, what Italian the prisoner meant?

De Bleuau now clearly and distinctly stated all he knew concerning him, and again demanded that his confession should be brought forward. But still Lafemas appeared in doubt. "Monsieur de Blenau," said he, "although this seems to me but a manœuvre to gain time, I have no objection that the papers of this court should be searched, if you can give us the bapfamal name of this Italian, of whom at present we know nothing; and even thisis a mere matter of grace and favor."

De Blenau declared his incapacity to do so, but protested against the unjust proceedings of the court, and showed that, if time and opportunity had been allowed for preparing his defence, he would have been enabled, by application to the Count de Chavigni, to bring forward the paper he mentioned, and to prove the truth of every thing he had asserted, by the evidence of persons now at a distance. He was still speaking when Lafemas rose and interrupted him. " Perceiving," said the judge, with unblushing effrontery, "that the p'isoner has concluded his defence. I will now occupy the court for a few moments, in order to explain the reasoning on which my own opinion is founded, although I see but one conclusion to which any one can come upon the merits of the case before us. It has been shown that the prisoner was the sworn-the bosom friend of the traitor who has already suffered for fis crimes; that he was in constant communication with almost all the conspirators; and that the royal duke, who has unfortunately died his name with so black a spot, at the very same time that he was engaged in plotting the run of his country, was in servet correspondence with the maintain bein a

It has farther been proved, that the prisoner. us. after having been relegue in Bourbon, quitted the place to which he was bound to confine himself. and went, upon what he cannot but own himself to be a wild romantic chase, into Champagne. This part of his story is a very strange one, according to his own showing ; but when we come to compare it with the confession of the traitor Cino Mars, the matter becomes more clear. It was in the old Castle of St. Loup, near the city of Troyes, says the confession, that the principal meeting of the conspirators was hold ; and it was to this very Casthe of St. Loup that the prisoner directed his course from Moulins. Evidently for the purpose of concealment also, the prisoner, on his return to "rovos, instead of directing his course to the inn where he had formerly alighted, proceeded to another, at which, unfortunately for himself, he was overtaken by the king's messenger. I think it is urnecessary to say more upon these points. To my mind they are convincing. It is true, indeed, Monsicur de Bleneau has shrewdly kept his handwriting from any paper which could prove him an active member of this conspiracy. But what man in his senses can doubt that he was criminally aware of its chistence ? This, then, is his crime : and I pronounce the concealment of treason to be as great a crime as treason itself. But if there were wanting a case in point to prove that the law considers it as such. I would cite the condemnation of De Thou, who, but two days ago, suffered with the traitor. Cinq Mars. Let us now, my brethren, he added, retire to consider of our sentence; for I have only spoken thus much, not to bias your opinion, but simply that the prisoner himself, before he leaves the court, may know, at least, my sentiments."

The judges now withdrew to the cabinet apprinted for their deliberations, and De Bienau was removed from the court to a small apartment hard by. He had not been here a moment when his page, Henri de La Mothe burst into the room. "My dear, dear, master !" exclaimed the boy, throwing himself at his feet, " they tell me that you certainly will not be condemned, for that you have not been taken to what is called the dead man's duelling: so the sentinel let me in to see you."

RICHELIEV.

249

"Henry ! how came you hither !" exclaiméd De Blenau, hurriedly—" But we have no time to think of that—My fate is sealed—I have read it in the triumphant glance of that demon, Lafemas. Mark me,my boy, and if ever you loved me, obey me well. When I am dead—do you hear ?—When I am dead, near my heart you will find a portrait. Take it, with this ring, to Mademoiselle de Beaumont. Tell her, that the one was the likeness of all I loved on earth ; and the other, the ring that was to have bound her to me forever. Say that De Blenau sends them to her in death, and that his last thought was of Pauline de Beaumont."

"Alas ! Mademoiselle de Bezumont !" said the page. But as he spoke, the door opened and an officer of the court entered, followed by a priest. "Begone, boy !" said the officer, leading Henry to the door. "How came you in hare ? We have more serious matter in hand now."

"Remember!" said De Blenau, holding up his hand impressively, "remember !" And Henry, bursting into tears, was hurried from the apartment. " Now, father, continued De Blenau, turning to the priest, "let as to your business."

"It is a sad one, my son," he replied ; " it is but to tell you, that you must prepare to leave a world of sorrow !"

"God's will be done !" said De Blenau.

VOL. IL

CHAPTER XX.

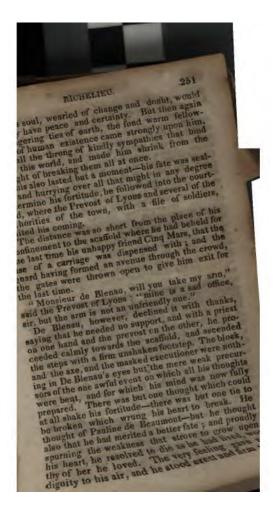

RICHELIEU.

Which, if the Reader can get through it, will bring bin the End of the History.

ALL delay in the execution of a sentence wh there exists no hope of mercy, is but needless a elty ; yet De Blenau was suffered to linger for teen weary nights and days between the day of condemnation and that appointed for his death. approached, however, at length. We are told, those who have had the best opportunities of ju ing, that the last night of a condemned prison existence is generally passed in slumber. It wa with De Blenau. Hope and fear were equ things gone by to him. The bitter sentence death had rong in his ear. He had traced the lines of affection to her he loved. He had paid last duties of religion : and fatigued with the str excitement which his mind had undergone, he th himself on his couch, and fell into that profo sleep which only despair can give, and which proaches near to annihilation.

He was yet buried in forgetfulness when the er came to announce that the fatal hour was co and for a moment, even after his spirit had res ed her powers, memory still wandered far from reality. He had not dreamed, but all though the last few months had been obliterated, and membrance, escaping from the painful present, gered fondly over all he had left behind.

It lasted not long, and as all the truth came r ing on his mind, he thought alone of his approa ing fate, and to meet it as became him. He has indeed, was sick of all the instability of the worthings, and for an instant there was a fering the amounting to satisfaction, when he though the eternal balancing between hope and fear, be joy and disappointment, was soon to be ow the soldiers were disposed about the scaffold, and his sentence was read aloud by the provost.

281 ·

MOHALIKU.

A great multitude surrounded the place, and fixed their eyes upon the victim of arbitrary power, as he stood calm and unmoved before them, in the spring of youth and the dignity of couscious innocence. There were few who had not heard of the Count de Blenau, and all that they had heard was good. The heart of man too, however fallen, has still one spot reserved for the dwelling of compassion, and its very weakness makes it soften to virtue in distress, and often even to forget faults in misfortunes. However that may be, there was a glistening in the eyes of many as they turned their looks towards De Blenau, who, according to the universal custom of the time, advanced to the front of the scaffold to address them. "Good friends," said he, "it is the will of Heaven that here I should give back the spirit which has been lent me; and so help me that God into whose bright presence I now go, as I am innocent of any crime towards my king and country !" A murmur ran among the people. "This is my last asseveration, he continued; "and my last counsel to you is, to keep your hearts clear and guiltless, so that if misfortune should follow any one as it has followed me, he may be able to lay his head upon the block as fearlessly as I do now." And retiring a step, he unloosed his collar, and knelt for the stroke of the execution-

"A horse! A horse! A council messenger! Pardon for the count! Pardon for the count !" cried a thousand voices from the crowd. De Bienau looked up. Headlong down the long mirrow street that then led in a straight line from the square, his horse in foung, his hat left far behind, and his long gray hair flying in the wind, spurring as if for life, came a horseman, who ever and anonheld up a packet in his hand, and vociferated something that was lost in the distance. He wave the frees of a lieutenant of the king's forests, and dealer. feet. "My noble, noble lord!" excla woodman. It was all that he could attee breath was gone with the rapidity of his p "What is all this ?" cried the Prevost coming forward. "And why do you step cution of the prisoner, Sir Lieutenant j all this ?"---

Philip started on his feet, "What is it claimed, "why, that none of you bloc wolves dare put a fang to the count's the what it is! There is his pardon, with own signature; ay, and the cardinal's to b least, so Monsieur de Chavigni tells me; no great clerk, I have not read it myself.

th e

×

he suffered himself to be conducted in silence house of the prevost; where he was soon discovered by his page, Henri de La Mothe. Ve shall now pass quickly over the means which took to procure money for the expenses of the mey before him, merely saying that, through the uness of the prevost, he was soon furnished with e necessary funds for proceeding j and according e necessary funds for proceeding ; and uter after set out from Lyons the second morning after Two hat, the events of which we have described. owerful reasons induced De Blenau to turn his iteps towards Spain in the first place, it was much nearer than either Germony or Flanders, which were the only other countries where he could hope for perfect security; and, in the next place, his road to the frontier passed not only close to his own estates, bat skirted the property of Madame de Beaumont, and he was not without hopes of meetpenumum, and he was not winder in the dearest to him of the ing there some that were the dearest to him of the earth ; for he learned from Henri de La Mothe. that the vengeance of the implacable Richelicu had extended to Pauline and her mother, who had been ordered once more to quit the court of France, as a punishment for having conveyed information to him Philip the woodman was not forgotten in De Blenau's new arrangements; and under the pretence of charging him with a letter back to St. in the Bastille. dermain's in case Madame de Beaumont should not be in Languedoc, the young count seduced him into a promise of accompanying him to Argentière. His real motive, however, was, to recompeche the woodman's services, on arriving at his own property, in a manner which the scanty state of his finances prevented him from doing at Ly-Notwithstanding all the joy he folt at his deliv-Notwithstanding all the juy he for it his deliv-erance, there was a heaviness hung over De Blenau erauce, unore was which he could not as as he rode out of Lyons, which he could not as count for, and a sensation of fatigue which hesh never felt before.

256 RICHELIEU. to the woodman, who, with Henri de La Mothe, dropped a little behind, and made him relate circumstances which led to his being despatchwith the king's pardon to Lyons. Philip's story. hich occupied a long while in telling, may be onsiderably shortened without disadvantage. It must be remembered, that at the time of De Menau's liberation from the Bastille, Chavigni had romised, as some compensation for all that Philip had suffered by his means, to have him appointed sous-lieutenant of the forest of Mantes : and he Philip was placed in the office, and exercised its functions, but the zolual brevet containing his offikept his word. cial appointment had been delayed by a multitude of other affairs pressing for attention, till the statesman's return from Narboane. At length, Philip heard that Chavigni had returned, and that the king, with all the ministers, were once more at St. Germain's; and he ventured to wait upon his patron, as he had been desired, to remind him of expediting the brevel. There were several persons wait-ing, and in his turn he was shown into the states-Chavigni had forgotten his face, and asked the man's cabinet. simple question, "Who are you?" Such simple questions, however, often produce more important consequences. "I am the woodman," replied Philip, " who was in prison with the Count de Blenau." "The Count de Blenau!" exclaimed Chavigni, while an expression of hortor passed over his countenance. "By all the saints, I had forgot ! Yet let me see, to day is Wednesday-there is yet time -stay here a moment " and he sushed out of she room, leaving the astonished woodman not knowing at all what he meant. In about a quarter of an hour the statesman returned, breathless with the expedition he had used-" There?" he exclaimed. putting a paper into Phillip's hand-"Phere w pardon, signed by both the king and the cards

BICHELIEU.

-Away !--take the swiftest horse in my stable :lose not a moment, or you will be too late ! Use the king's name for fresh horses, and show that signature.--Tell the count, Chavigni has kept his word."

"And where am 1 to go?" demanded Philip, quietly, still completely ignorant of the cause of Chavigni's agitation.

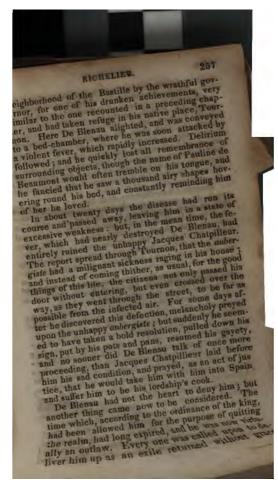

"To Lyons, to Lyons! you fool !" cried Chavigni. "If you use not all speed, the count's head will be off before you arrive with his pardon."

"The Count de Blenau ?" demanded Philip.

"Yes, yes, I tell you !" reiterated the statesman. "Your good old friend, the Count de Blenau ! So lose no time, if you would save his life."

Philip lost no time, and arrived at Lyons, as we have seen, just at the critical moment of De Blenau's fate.

Though Philip's narrative served to interest De Blenau, and the chattering of Henri de La Mothe to amuse him on the way, nevertheless he could not conceal from himself that there was a lassitude gradually growing upon him, which seemed to announce the approach of some serious sickness, Naturally of a strong constitution, and an ardent temperament, he never yielded to indisposition till unable to sustain it any longer; and though fatigue, anxiety, and distress, had weakened him much. and his two attendants often hinted that he looked unwell, and required repose, De Blenau would not acknowledge that he was ill until he arrived in the neighborhood of Tournon. There, however, the powers of nature failed him, and he felt that he could proceed no farther. Scarcelyable to sit on his horse, he entered the town, and looked eagerly about for some place where he could repose, when suddenly the eyes of Henri de La Mothe rested upon the well-known sign of the Sanglier Gourmand, which, as, they afterward found, was still kept by no other person than the celebrated Jacques distpilleur, who had at last been driven from the aby law his blood could be required at the hand into one who shed it. These circumstances, iough not very agreeable in themselves, would have iven De Blenau but little concern, had not the indge Lafemas been still in his immediate neighbarhood. But from his vindictive spirit he had every thing to fear if discovered within the precincts of France after the allotted time had expired and in consequence he determined to travel by might, as soon as his strength was sufficiently restored, and to effect his escape into Spain with as little delay as possible.

AICHELIEU.

Jacques Chatpilleur applied himself with all the vigor of an ancien vicandier to re-establish his new lord in his former robust health, and succeeded so well as to leave but little traces of all that fever and anxiety had done appon his frame. In the mean time, Henri de La Mothe took care to prepare secretly every thing for their departure ; and Philip the woodman, who had 'somewhat balanced between a wish to return to his family and love for the good young count, determined to follow him to the inputier, as soon as he heard that his life was at the mercy of any one who chose to take it.

Under these circumstances, one clear autumn night, towards twelve o'clock, De Blesau sallied forth from the little town of Tourgos, accompanied by the somewhat burious escort of the innkeaper, the woodman, and the page, and proceeding silently and cautiously, arrived safely in the neighborhood of La Vaulte, where, botaking themselves to one of the large open fields of the country, the party reposed themselves under the mulberry-trees, which by this time had been long stripped.both of their green leaves and their ailkew bulls, but which still offered some degrae of concealment, and something to which they coeld attach their horses.

At noos lacques Chatpilleur, as the most expert. was despatched to the town for some provider which commission he executed with great seal y discretion, and returning, informed De Eleann

RIGHELIEU

he had seen a gentleman in black pass through the town, accompanied by a considerable train habited in the same sad color.

As De Blenau conjectured that this might be Lafemas, it was determined to take additional precautions, and rather to live upon scanty fare than send into any town again ; and setting off as soon asit was dark, they passed by Privas, and reached the skirts of the thick wood that began about Aubenas, and sweeping round La Gorce extended almost to Viviers on the one side, and to L'Argentière on the other. Near to Viviers lay the estates of the Marchioness de Beaumont, and within a league of Argentière was the Château de Blenau; but it was towards the former that De Blenau bent his steps as soon as the second night had come. Before they had gone far, it began to rain hard, and though the wood afforded some covering, yet the lateness of the season had stripped it of all that could yield any efficient shelter, except at a spot where two evergreen oaks, growing together like twin-brothers, spread their still verdant branches over a considerable space of ground. De Blenau was inclined to proceed as quickly as possible ; but Jacques Chatpillieur, who now acted as body physician as well as cook, so strongly cautioned his lord to avoid the wet, that the whole party betook themselves to the shelter of the oaks, in hopes of the rain passing away.

Before them lay a considerable tract of road, upon which, after about half an hour of heavy rain, the moon began to shine once more; and De Blenau was about to proceed, when the sound of horses was heard upon the very path which they had just passed. De Blenau and his party drew back as quietly as possible behind the trees, and though the hores' feet still made some noise, the water dropping from the branches of the forest was chough to cover the sound. Scarcely, however, were they themselves concealed, when a horseman sevenes. Upon the road in a somine-colored suit, with seven one riding on his right-hand, whom De Blenau judged to be an inferior, from the bending position in which he listened to what the other said. Six servants followed at a little distance, and a straggler brought up the rear, wringing the wet from the skirts of his doublet. One by one they passed slowly by; the uncertain light showing them to be well armed and mounted, but still not shining sufficiently to allow De Blenau the opportunity of considering their features, though he thought the first rider was in some degree familiar to him. It was not unlike that of Lafemas, yet, as far as he could judge, taller and more erect. The cavalcade passed on, and were seen winding down the road in the moonlight, till they came opposite to a spot where some felled timber and blocks of stone embarrassed the ground. Immediately that they arrived there, there was a bright flash, the report of a carbine, and one of the horses fell suddenly to the ground. In a moment, nine or ten horsemen and two or three on foot ushed forth from the wood; and the clashing of steel, the report of pistols, and various cries of wrath or agony came sweeping upon the gale.

"Were it Lafemas' himself," cried De Blenau, "this must not be! En avant pour la France!" and dashing his rowels into the horse's side, he galloped headlong down the road, followed by the woodman, the page, and the redoubtable Jacques Chatpilleur.

Two moments brought them to the scene of the combat, and the moon shining out seemed expressly to light the fray. The one party was evidently to be distinguished by their black habits, the fother by their rusty cuirasses and morions. Directly in the way of De Blenau was the exvalier he had n arked, as he passed, contending with a man of almost gigantic strength; but notwithstanding the superior force of the latter, his antagonist still foiled him by his skillful defence, when suddenly one of the robbers on foot attacked the cavalier also behind. Thus bescl, he turned to strike him down, when the tree endous Norman (for it was no other) caught idle rein, and urging the horse back, threw it he ground. The robber on foot shortened ake he carried to plunge it in his body. But by ime De Blenau's party had come up; and the co geous aubergiste galloping on, bore the point of long sword in a direct line forward, which cate the pikeman just below the cuirass, spitted his use Jacques Chatpilleur's own expression, just a widgeon.

In the mean while, the Norman had turned De Blenau, and snapped a pistol at his head, w however, missed fire. Enraged at his disapp ment, he threw the weapon from him, and spu on his horse aimed a tremendous blow at the o which was instantly parried, and returned straightforward lunge that cut him above the and deluged his face in blood. Mad with the and half-blinded with the gore, Marteville atten once more the feat by which he had overth his former antagonist; and, catching De Ble rein, urged his horse back with Herculean stro In vain the count spurred him forward; he san on his haunches, and was floundering in the when De Blenau, finding it inevitable, let go rein, fixed his knees firm in the saddle, and ra his sword with both hands, discharged it with a force upon the head of the Norman. The true passed clear on, hewed through the iron mo cleft through hair and scull, and sank deep int brain. He reeled in the saddle ; his hands le their grasp, and he fell headlong to the ground, the horse of de Bienau, suddenly released from pressure, rose up, and plunging foward, trod him der its feet. De Bleuau lost not his presence of for a moment, and while his horse was yet in spring, he aimed a blow at the Gros St. Nie who had been hurrying to the assistance of his tain, which disabled his shoulder, and threw rom his horse. " Sauve qui peut " cried in , starting up on his feet, and running for the wood, Sauve qui pout ! The captain is dead !"

"Sauce qui peut ! Suuce qui peut !" rang among e robbers, and in a few minutes De Blenau and is party were left masters of the field. The count rew up his horse, exclaiming "Do not follow ! Do tot follow ! Let us look to the wounded ;" and dismounting, he hurried to assist the fallen cavalier, who was struggling to disengage himself from his horse.

"Next to God, sir, I have to thank you," said the stranger, as soon as he had risen. "But—is it possible! Monsieur de Blenau!" be exclaimed as the moonlight gleamed on the countenance of the count. "God of heaven, I thought you were in Spain long ago!"

"Monsieur de Chavigni ! or l am mistaken," said De Blenan. " But I know that I can trust to your honor, and therefore must say, that though my late illness may have rendered me an outlaw, by detaining me in France after my sentence of exile, yet I will not regret it, as it has given me the opportunity of serving the man to whom 1 am indebted for my life.—There, sir, is my hand."

Chavigni embraced him warmly. "Let us look to the men who are wounded, Monsieur De Blenau," said he, " and then I will give you a piece of news which however painful to me, will be satisfactory to you. Cannot some one strike a light, that we may examine more carefully what has occurred on this unhappy spot; for I see many on the earth."

"It shall be done in the turning of a spit, monseigneur," said Jacques Chatpilleur, who had already collected some dry wood; and who now quickly produced a fire by means of the flint of a pistol.

The scene that presented itself was a sad one. On the earth lay two of Chavigni's servants dead, and one desperately wounded. To these was ad ded Henri de La Mothe, who had received a serv cut on the head, and was stunned with the b ot far from the body of the Norman lay his companion Callot, who was the pikeman despatched by the hellicose aubergiste. In addition to these was a tobber, whose head had been nearly severed from his body by the cutlass which was borne by Philip the woodman, in his capacity of lieutenant of the king's forests; and one so severely wounded by a pistol-ball from the hand of Chavigni, that his companions had been obliged to abandon him. From him they learned that the attack upon Chavigni had been preconcerted ; that understanding he was bending his steps towards Montpelier, Marteville had obtained exact information of his course ; and finding that he must pass through the forest by Viviers, had laid in wait for him, with the expectation both of revenge and plunder.

"And now, Monsieur de Blenau," said Chavigui, as soon as their investigation ended, "whither does your immediate path lay ? You know you can trust me."

"I do," said De Blensu. "I go first towards Viviere, to the château of the late Marquis de Beaumont."

"And I go there too," said Chavigni. "I am even now expected ; for I sent forward a servant to announce my coming."

"Indeed ?" exclaimed De Blenau, "May I ask your errand ?"

A faint smile curled Chavigni's lip, which was uncommonly pale. "You will hear on my arrival," said he ; "for I see you are ignorant of what has lately taken place, though the couriers must have arrived in all the towns three days ago. But let us have our wounded brought along, and we will proceed to the chitesu.--It cannot be far distant."

The preparations were soon made-the chateau was soon reached-and Pauline de Beaumont was soon once more clasped in the arms of her lover.---But let all that pass.

"Madame," said Chavigni, advancing to the marchioness, " you doubtless wonder as much as Monaieur de Blenau, what can have brought me hitl But as I came to Montpellier, I had the king's co mands to inform you, that the fine which was posed upon your estates is remitted in full. And you, Monsieur de Blenau, I have to announce, i your banishment is at an end, for his majesty given permission to all exiles to return to Frar with a very few exceptions, among which you, not included.—I need not tell you, from these cumstances, that the Cardinal de Richelieu is des

"Good God !" exclaimed De Blenau, "so soo "Even so !" replied Chavigni. "Monsieur Blenau, doubtless you are happy—for he was y enemy.—But he was to me a friend—he was net a father, and I mourn for him."

"May he rest in peace !" said de Blenau. " was a great man. May he rest in peace !"

Little more remains to be said; for this long tory draws towards its close. The sorrows, the d gers, and the difficulties, which had so long a rounded De Blenau and Pauline, had now pas away, like the storms of a summer day, that o cloud the morning, but leave the evening calm fair. They were united in the beautiful valley Languedoc, and in the fair scenes where they first met, they continued to live on in happiness love, till the hand of time led them gently to grave.

"Ci git Claude, Comte de Blenau."

THE END.

.